Mr. GREEN of Iowa. That may be clear to the gentleman, but it would be much simpler to me if he could give me the number of passengers that cross the bridge, and then I could multiply that at the rate of one-half a cent per passenger and get the result myself.

Mr. CARLIN. I can not do that because no estimate has been kept of the passengers crossing the bridge, so far as I know, because that has not been the method of payment for the use of this bridge. That has been the method of payment for the Highway Bridge, but not this bridge.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The street car companies ought to be able to give it very easily.

Mr. CARLIN. They may be, but I can not give it to the gentleman because I have not got it. I assume, however, that it is equal to the travel on the other bridge, and on that assumption I have based the estimate that I have made.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARLIN. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does the gentleman understand that the terms carried in this bill for the railroad pay, one-half of 1 cent for each passenger transported each way on this bridge, are identical in amount and terms with that governing the Highway Bridge?

Mr. CARLIN. Yes. Mr. Chairman, I will take the time of the House just for one moment more to answer the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN]. After having admitted that he believed that a great majority of the travel across this bridge into Virginia was by citizens of other States, he then concluded that for that reason Virginia should pay for the bridge. It occurs to me that the gentleman's conclusions are wrong, though I am willing to admit the correctness of his statement. This is the National Capital. At Arlington there is perhaps the most interesting national cemetery in the country. Almost every visitor to the Capital, from wherever he may come, visits the national cemetery at Arlington, and in order to do so the natural journey is across the Aqueduct Bridge. If there were a military movement from Fort Myer desired to Washington City, the Government would have to move its cavalry across that bridge. The agricultural farm, the property of the United States Government, uses that bridge in carrying those who are interested in the operations there and the products of the farm which come from there. The Government to-day owns in Alexandria County twelve hundred and odd acres of land, worth from $1,500 to $2,500 an acre.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARLIN. Yes.

Mr. MANN. We have constructed a military road over there, have we not, leading from the Highway Bridge through the experimental farm and up to Arlington?

Mr. CARLIN. We have.

Mr. MANN. Why was that done?

Mr. CARLIN. That was done for two purposes, first, because the Congress of the United States refused to repair the Aqueduct Bridge so that it could be used—we have been six years trying to get this thing done—and in order to provide for an emergency military movement we had to build a road from the other bridge.

Mr. MANN. So that cavalry can come down the other way?

Mr. CARLIN. Well, it would depend upon which way the cavalry desired to go as to which would be the more desirable bridge. If the cavalry were going north from Washington or west from Washington they would cross the Aqueduct Bridge. If it were coming simply to Washington for use here, it could and would go by the Highway Bridge.

Now, as I have stated, the Government owns these valuable lands in Virginia, and, above all, the Government owns the land upon which this bridge is to be constructed; and it seems to me a remarkably narrow view for any gentleman to undertake to say that the State of Virginia ought to construct the bridge upon Government land, give control of that bridge to the Federal Government, and have nothing to do with it except to contribute to the payment. Virginia does not ask for anything to which she is not entitled. We are not supplicants for the charity of any Government of any people; but Virginia has the right to say through me to this Congress, and she ought to say it, that she has never been requested in any spirit of real earnestness to participate in the ownership of this bridge, and therefore she does not feel called upon to participate in the payment of it. If we were going to look to-day to the accounts between Virginia and the Federal Government, if we were going to open the ledger and see where the balance is, we would have no difficulty in finding where the obligation rests.

Mr. ANDERSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARLIN. In a second. The White House which the President occupies to-day was built with money loaned to the Federal Government by the Commonwealth of Virginia when this Government was unable to borrow money from individuals, when it was small and helpless and needy. All the years have passed and that claim remains unpaid. The streets which were laid off in this Capital City, and in the original making of the Capital, when the lots themselves were laid off, Virginia loaned the money. The Government made an enormous profit out of the sale of the lots. Virginia is to-day unpaid. But we care nothing about this small matter of money. Virginia when she came and asked payment of the money never said it should be paid into the treasury of Virginia, but she said, use it for the construction of an avenue from Washington to the tomb of the man whose name this city bears, in order that every American youth may travel to Mount Vernon and there be inspired by his visit. We never asked to put this money back into the treasury of Virginia; oh, no; but we said, put it where the people of the Nation, aye, the Nation that Virginia gave birth to, might enjoy its use. My countrymen, I warm up a little when I am upon this subject and I find I am about to launch into a speech. Nothing is further from my purpose; but I did feel that it was my duty, while gentlemen were trying to have it appear that the Government was doing so much for Virginia, to call attention to the fact that Virginia has done something for the Government. Why, it was only half a dozen miles from the Aqueduct Bridge in Virginia one Sunday morning after services in Christ Churchyard that Harry Lee, Washington, and others met, and that meeting shook the British throne and established this American Republic. [Applause.] And yet, my friends, after the admission of my friend the gentleman from Illinois that the United States uses this structure, to contend for its payment otherwise than by making it as we do to-day would be ludicrous.

Now, if any gentleman wishes to ask me a question, I shall be delighted to answer.

Mr. ANDERSON. The gentleman warmed up to such good purpose that I almost forgot the question I desired to ask him. The gentleman contends that because the Government owns the land on both sides of the river upon which this bridge will be located the State of Virginia ought not to be required to pay any part of the construction of the bridge. Now, I would like——

Mr. CARLIN. My further contention is that the State of Virginia has no control over the bridge.

Mr. ANDERSON. What benefit would the State of Virginia receive from the ownership of the bridge or part of the bridge which she will not have under present conditions?

Mr. CARLIN. The very fact that the Government receives the revenue by charging those who use the bridge, and it may turn out to be a very profitable investment.

Mr. ANDERSON. Are we to understand this to be a toll bridge?

Mr. CARLIN. Virginia would have the right to control it as she pleased if she owned the bridge, to make it a toll bridge if she so desired and charge the railroad for the use, which the Government does now, and puts it into the Treasury of the Government as the result of it. Virginia would not receive a nickel from it under the proposed bill.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CARLIN. I will.

Mr. MANN. How much is now collected from the Washington & Old Dominion Railway for the use of the present Aqueduct Bridge?

Mr. CARLIN. I do not believe they pay anything, but I do not know. I think they were admitted there upon the theory that the electric railway was an improved highway and that the people had the right to use it for walking or riding over the bridge. My impression is that they pay nothing now, but I do believe it will only be a matter of a few years when the revenues raised from the occupation of this bridge will equal 4 per cent on the investment of the Government.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARLIN (continuing). And with the Government issuing bonds at 2½ and 3 per cent this is a profitable business to go into. Certainly, I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. STAFFORD. At the present time the Old Dominion Railway only occupies one track running across the bridge. It has been suggested here that we provide a proper width to accommodate two tracks, which will increase the cost something like 20 per cent of the entire cost of construction. Has the gentleman considered, or has the committee considered, the necessity of providing a double track in place of a single track?

Mr. CARLIN. I can only say to the gentleman I was not a member of the committee which considered this bill, although I drew the bill and am its patron.

Mr. STAFFORD. This bill provides a double track.

Mr. CARLIN. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. We know that, as at present managed, there is no through service from Washington across this bridge; that the Old Dominion Railway service ends with the Georgetown side at the Washington terminus of the bridge.

What is the need, then, of levying this additional expense by giving them a right of way for the double track when a single track is at present used and seems to meet the needs of the Old Dominion Railway? It seems in this particular that the Old Dominion Railway is the one that is favored and not the public, or favored at the expense of the United States Treasury.

Mr. CARLIN. If the gentleman will permit me, I think the answer is perfectly simple. At present there is only one railroad occupying the bridge. It has the exclusive use to the bridge, but this bill provides that all railways may cross, if they please to do so, and that they must do so upon the terms fixed by the Secretary of War, and I assume that we are going to have additional travel in the future.

Now, as to the additional cost of the bridge by reason of that, I do not believe, notwithstanding what has been said, that it will be a dollar; and I will tell you why. In constructing the present Highway Bridge across the Potomac River the originals plans were carried out and completed before it was thought of putting an electric railway upon the bridge. The railways were then using what was known as the old Long Bridge. After the plan had developed the electric railway was allowed to cross that bridge. It laid its track upon the level of the general floor of the bridge. The whole surface, with the exception of a few inches occupied by the rail, is of asphalt, and the consequence is the part of the bridge which the track occupies is just as much a part of the bridge as if the track was not there. So the only additional cost is the cost to the railroad itself of laying its rails and electrifying the bridge for the operation of the cars.

Mr. STAFFORD. Of course that part of the bridge that is now used by the railroad is partly appropriated by the railroad and not used for vehicles?

Mr. CARLIN. The gentleman is mistaken. It is used entirely for vehicles, except when the cars are passing over or on the track.

Mr. STAFFORD. For instance, take the Rock Creek Bridge, on which cars go out to Chevy Chase, while vehicles may use the trackage between the tracks, nevertheless we know the vehicles use only the part that is on the side of the tracks; and I think if we are going to provide for double tracks, it will mean the making of the bridge much wider than contemplated if the tracks were not laid on the bridge.

Mr. CARLIN. I do not think so. Have you ever been over the Highway Bridge between Washington and Virginia?

Mr. STAFFORD. Not the Highway Bridge. I have crossed the Aqueduct Bridge many times.

Mr. CARLIN. I believe it is not wider than the Aqueduct Bridge, and yet they have two tracks on it, but the tracks are not a hindrance to other vehicles except when the cars are on the tracks.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman will say that the travel over the Highway Bridge is very scant?

Mr. CARLIN. I think there is a car every five or six minutes. There are something like 100 trains a day.

Mr. MANN. Probably nothing like every five or six minutes. But it is not real street-car service, like city service is?

Mr. CARLIN. They run a street-car service from Washington to some suburban points at street-car prices, and they sell tickets, I think, six for a quarter, just as they do in the city of Washington.

Mr. MANN. But the gentleman will not for a moment claim that the number of cars that go over that bridge is comparable with a number of cars on a street-car line in the city of Washington?

Mr. CARLIN. All I know is that it amounts to several millions of passengers a year that go over the bridge, and who pay fare.

Mr. MANN. Do they pay any revenue?

Mr. CARLIN. Yes, sir.

Mr. MANN. How much do they pay?

Mr. CARLIN. Twelve thousand five hundred dollars, I understand, a year. It amounts to about 4 per cent on $300,000; it may be a little less than the sum I have named.

Mr. LENROOT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARLIN. I will.

Mr. LENROOT. The gentleman stated that he drafted this bill.

Mr. CARLIN. I drafted the original bill.

Mr. LENROOT. The first section authorizes the construction of this bridge and limits the cost to $1,000,000. Section 5 appropriates $300,000 to commence the construction of the bridge and the approaches thereto. I want to ask the gentleman whether it was his thought that a limitation of $1,000,000 should include the approaches?

Mr. CARLIN. No; it is not; and I will tell you why. The lowest estimate of a bridge is within $1,000,000. This bill provides for the construction of the bridge at or near the present site, but does not compel its construction upon the present site.

Mr. HULBERT. Mr. Chairman, right at that point will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARLIN. I will when I have answered this question. Therefore it may be found to be necessary, when they make the river soundings, to move this end of the bridge; and in doing that they may have to pay for some property on the Washington side of the river. I am very glad that it does not occur on the Virginia side, because in that event somebody might suspect that somebody in Virginia would make something out of this bridge. That is not possible on the Virginia side, but it is possible and even probable that on this side they will have to condemn some land.

Mr. LENROOT. The cost of the improvement may possibly become very great?

Mr. CARLIN. Yes. That is an engineering proposition to a large extent. Of course, they have to approach this bridge, as suggested by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] in such a way that the bridge, when constructed, will not offer any obstruction to navigation.

Mr. LENROOT. Has the gentleman any estimate of the probable cost of these approaches?

Mr. CARLIN. No; and no one else has; because it is impossible to state within what limits this bridge will be constructed until the plans and surveys have been made.

Mr. LENROOT. It might run into another million dollars?

Mr. CARLIN. Oh, no. After talking the problem over with engineers and with others, I have not the slightest idea that it will approach the amount we have appropriated.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MANN rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized.

Mr. HULBERT. Mr. Chairman, I simply want to thank the gentleman for yielding to me and answering my question. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. I will yield to the gentleman from Virginia, in order that he may answer the gentleman from New York.

Mr. HULBERT. The gentleman answered my question.

Mr. CARLIN. I thank the gentleman. I am always glad to give information when the House desires it.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Virginia desire time? The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] yielded to him.

Mr. MANN. I yielded to the gentleman to answer the question of the gentleman from New York.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Illinois yield to me for a moment, not for a question, but a statement?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, there are some very pressing unanimous-consent bills on the calendar, and I suspect that probably some of this debate and the delay incident to it is aimed at another bill on the calendar, one in which I am interested. I do not think the gentleman from Illinois is a party to that matter.

Mr. MANN. I certainly am not.

Mr. LEVER. I will say that I am withdrawing the bill I am interested in, and I am going over to my office and going to work.

Mr. ADAMSON. The gentleman does not mean this bill. He means another bill.

Mr. CARLIN. I congratulate the gentleman on going to work. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. I am sorry the gentleman from South Carolina is delayed by the discussion on this bill, but when he says he is going to his office and is going to work, I can not help but smile, because I happen to know that he is the father for the first time of a little daughter, and he evidently is going home. [Applause.] We are all proud of it, and we extend to him and his better half our congratulations. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, ordinarily on unanimous-consent day we do not stop to discuss at any length bills that come before the House by unanimous consent, and it would not be a desirable practice. Yet in view of the situation as to the Aqueduct Bridge it did seem desirable to have Congress act upon it speedily. If there has been delay in the past, it has been because we have delayed it. It has not been because it has not in a way been called to the attention of Congress, and the situation is now such that there ought to be something done concerning the bridge. We ought to determine if we are not going to do anything, and let them close it up, or we ought to provide some method of taking care of the present bridge or constructing a new bridge; and without taking up time on unanimous-consent day there did not seem to be any chance of taking this bill up in a reasonable time except by unanimous consent. That is the only excuse I have for saying anything on the matter.

On this side of the Potomac River is the District of Columbia, and I understand our title runs over to and includes the low-water mark on the Virginia side.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. The high-water mark.

Mr. MANN. Yes; the high-water mark on the Virginia side, so that the District of Columbia and the Government outside of other ownership would own the title, probably, of the necessary supports for the bridge; certainly beyond the middle of the stream. But on the other side of the Potomac we have Fort Myer, and we have Arlington and the Arlington Agricultural Experiment Station, covering a large amount of land, and I suppose practically owning most of the way, if not all the way; certainly to the extent of a road from the bridge up to Fort Myer.

We have the Highway Bridge, which is down this way from the Aqueduct Bridge, which has now been connected with Arlington and Fort Myer by a very fine military road, not constructed for the purpose of troops marching, because, instead of running in a straight line, it curves around every possible thing it can curve around. There is not a straight line on it anywhere for any distance. That is one of the fancy things we have done.

But that road and bridge are not sufficient. I think sooner or later we must construct a new bridge to take the place of the Aqueduct Bridge for our own use; that the Government itself, for its own convenience, if there were nothing else involved, would have to build a bridge across the river at about that point. Of course, the people of the District of Columbia, engaged in business here on the one side, desire the people to come in from Virginia with their goods to sell and to make purchases, and the people engaged in business here who desire to live in Virginia and to go home and come back make it a desirable thing to have the bridge in the interest of the District of Columbia. However, there is a little feature, in addition to that, which I think has not been very fully described by my friend from Virginia [Mr. CARLIN]. You can build a bridge for the purposes of the Government that need not be a very wide bridge. It does not require quite as strong a superstructure or foundation. You could build a bridge for the use of the teams that come across it without making it a very wide bridge; but it is proposed here to have a street car line on the bridge; and while the bill provides for one or more street car lines and authorizes the Washington & Old Dominion Railway specifically to operate on the bridge, and provides for other street car lines, as a matter of fact there is no possibility of any other street car company using this bridge. It is a physical impossibility. The Pennsylvania Avenue line could use the bridge by running across to the Virginia side, but the passengers transfer there under the present system, and there would be no earthly object in having the Virginia line run its cars over to the District side and then, in addition to that, having the District line run its cars over to the Virginia side. One car line across the bridge would answer all purposes. And if, as sooner or later will likely happen, the Washington & Old Dominion Railway Co., the Virginia line, is absorbed by the District of Columbia line, the Pennsylvania Avenue line, that is the only car line that can possibly cross the bridge.

Mr. CARLIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. CARLIN. I am sure the gentleman wants to be informed——

Mr. MANN. Just cut that out and make the statement.

Mr. CARLIN. The gentleman wants to be informed about the electric lines there.

Mr. MANN. I do not know whether I do or not.

Mr. CARLIN. The Falls Church railroad now has a track constructed to the southern approach of this bridge. That is an entirely different line from the Old Dominion.

Mr. MANN. It runs over the tracks of the Old Dominion Railway, does it not?

Mr. CARLIN. No; it does not come across the bridge at all now.

Mr. MANN. Possibly not. There may be a dozen lines from Virginia that come in there. I do not know.

Now, as a matter of fact hardly any visitor ever crosses this bridge on the street car line, or probably ever will. If one goes from Washington to Fort Myer by the car line, the most interesting thing he sees—and about the only interesting thing he does see on his way—is when crossing the Potomac River. The flowing water has a fascination for the eye everywhere. People voluntarily walk across the river—that is, visitors who go from this side. Of course the regular patrons who live over in Virginia get tired of walking across and looking at the water, and they come through on the car line. So the car line authorized on this bridge is purely and solely for the benefit of those people who live over in Virginia who come over into the District of Columbia. That is a proper place for people to live and this is a proper place to come to, but the bridge will have to be a good deal wider and a good deal stronger than would otherwise be required in order to accommodate these Virginia people. Only a few days ago we passed a law removing the Washington & Old Dominion Railway Co. from any control of the Public Utilities Commission of this District, except so far as their line is in the District of Columbia; and I believe the only place where it is in the District of Columbia is where it crosses the present Aqueduct Bridge, which a car seldom runs over. Now, how much more it is going to cost has not been ascertained. It will cost a good deal more money than the Government needs for a bridge to use for its purposes, and the additional cost will be for the benefit of the people in Virginia.

I understand very well that up to the present time real estate on the Virginia side has not been very much developed. In the movement of new building operations in Washington they have spread around the District of Columbia, but it is inevitable that the territory on the Virginia side will be developed. More or less development has been going on there now. Some Members of this House live over there already during the sessions of Congress, and doubtless more soon will live there.

Now, it is proposed to build a bridge at a starting price of $1,000,000, probably $250,000 being represented by the added cost of the bridge in order to accommodate people who live in the State of Virginia. It hardly seems to me that it is an answer to that proposition to say that when certain very distinguished Virginians in the early days of the Republic had secured the location of the Capital of the United States at this spot, and, in order to make that secure and without possible failure, had procured the State of Virginia to give the Government of the United States $100,000 to be expended here, which they never asked and never intended to be returned to them—it is hardly an answer to say, when we are to do something now for their present benefit, that their great grandfathers years ago did something in their own interest to secure the location of the Capital at Washington.

If these Virginians are receiving this benefit, if the Washington & Old Dominion Railway Co. and the Great Falls Railway Co. are going to use this bridge, why should not they pay that much of the cost of its construction as is caused by their use of the bridge?

The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. CARLIN] says they propose to pay half a cent a passenger, and he said a while ago that that would pay the interest at 4 per cent on the entire cost of the bridge. Well, that would mean 8,000,000 passengers a year. Now, if there is going to be 8,000,000 passengers a year going over the bridge into Virginia, that is going to be a tremendously valuable thing for Virginia. If they are going to have such a population as that go to and from the District of Columbia, amounting to 8,000,000 in the course of a year, certainly they ought to advance the money to pay for it. If it is going to develop their territory in that way, how can they escape the proposition?

Mr. CARLIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. CARLIN. The gentleman seems to miss the force of my argument; he only follows the words. I was trying to show that if they paid half a cent each way they would pay for the use of the bridge. The gentleman's remarks have confirmed me by saying that only Virginians will travel over the bridge, and therefore Virginia will pay the half cent, for I have no doubt that the railroad company will not carry them without making them pay the half cent.

Mr. MANN. That is a promise in the future. You propose to have us hold the sack—you want us to advance the money—but if your promise is good the value is to you, which you ought to pay for now.

Another thing I would like to ask about. The gentleman introduced a bill carrying a million and a half dollars. It authorizes the expenditure of a million in the substitute report. There is a disagreement whether that covers the approaches or not. The bill is not plain. The other day I was forced into the position of asking the House to authorize an increase in the appropriation or limitation for the Lincoln Memorial. I believe, as a general thing, in having people determine how much they will do things for. What guaranty is there here from any statement or information that has been yet secured which authorizes the reduction in this bill from a million and a half dollars to a million dollars? Was it because it looked as though a million dollars would be easier to get through, or because the gentleman from Virginia, in introducing the bill, made no investigation as to the cost of the bridge before he introduced it, and have they acquired additional information since the bill was introduced? This matter has been under consideration for a long time. Army and District engineers have investigated and reported upon this time and time again. When did the light appear that showed the difference in the cost between a million and a half dollars on December 6 and a million dollars on February 11?

Mr. ADAMSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. ADAMSON. I desire to state to the gentleman, in connection with his discussion, that there is no discrepancy. The committee made the amendment because the committee, after investigation, learned from the officials of the War Department that less than a million dollars would do this work and build this bridge.

Mr. MANN. I would like to see a statement of that kind from the War Department.

Mr. ADAMSON. We have it from Col. Langfitt.

Mr. MANN. Why does not the gentleman make them produce a statement in writing and put it into the report? Everybody knows that loose statements on the floor of this House amount to nothing, and that if we start to build this bridge we have to finish it.

Mr. ADAMSON. It would have made a rather lengthy report if we had considered it necessary to recite Col. Langfitt's letter, and I wish to assure the gentleman that I have not made any loose statement on the floor of the House. We had Col. Langfitt before the subcommittee two years ago, and we had him produce a statement as to what it would cost to construct it. The letter could be found somewhere. It is not a formal report from the Secretary of War, but it is information on which the committee acted in reducing the amount to $1,000,000.

Mr. MANN. The distinguished gentleman says that two years ago they had a letter from the colonel stating that this bridge could be constructed for $1,000,000, and yet the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. CARLIN], who is a very live wire here in reference to this bridge, in December last, after careful consideration and reconsideration of the subject, two years later than the colonel's letter, proposed to appropriate one million and a half for the construction of the bridge.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. LENROOT. I desire to ask the gentleman from Georgia whether he will not put that letter in the RECORD?

Mr. ADAMSON. I will, if I can find it, and I think I can.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The gentleman from Georgia said that he had a letter from some engineer, a letter 2 years old, stating "this" bridge could be built. What bridge? Is it a bridge? If it is this bridge, there must be definite plans and designs. What can be built for this amount of money?

Mr. MANN. I think they have made a number of reports heretofore. That they have made definite plans I do not undertake to say, but I do not know, and no one here now can tell from a reading of this bill, whether this million dollars is to include the cost of the approaches to the bridge or even whether it is to include the land condemned for the approaches.

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. In a moment.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Is there anything in this bill to show of what material the bridge is to be constructed?

Mr. MANN. No.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Is there anything in the bill to show how many arches there are to be in the bridge?

Mr. MANN. No.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Is there anything to show the height of the bridge above the water?

Mr. MANN. There is not anything to show that, but that practically is fixed, of course.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. When they speak of "this" bridge, what bridge is referred to?

Mr. MANN. I suppose the gentleman refers to the Aqueduct Bridge. I remember very well that there were some very fancy pictures and specifications, blue prints, and so forth, very fancy, very extensive, for the memorial bridge the first term that I was in Congress, and that is nearly 20 years ago.

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. CARLIN. I can very easily explain the difference between $1,500,000, which was provided for in the bill as I introduced it, and the $1,000,000 as the bill appears now, as the committee has amended it. I was willing to build a much better bridge than the committee seems to have been willing to build.

Mr. MANN. I have now gotten the thing I wanted. Before this bridge is constructed, plans must be submitted to the Fine Arts Commission.

Mr. SIMS. Must be?

Mr. MANN. Must be. Does any gentleman here think that the Fine Arts Commission is going to cut out any of the beauties of the bridge which the gentleman from Virginia wanted to build?

Mr. CARLIN. Does the gentleman think that they ought to be cut out?

Mr. MANN. In order to build a plain structure?

Mr. CARLIN. Does the gentleman believe that they ought to cut out any of the attractiveness that ought to be in it?

Mr. MANN. I do not.

Mr. CARLIN. Nor do I.

Mr. MANN. But I want to know what the bridge is going to cost. The gentleman now says that some of them were cut out.

Mr. CARLIN. I did not cut them out, but the committee cut them out.

Mr. MANN. But the gentleman reduces it from a million and a half to a million dollars, but he does not think it ought to be done. What does that mean? They do not intend to do it.

Mr. SIMS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. I will.

Mr. SIMS. Will not that be rather an argument that may be used against authorizing the building of the memorial bridge that is to cost five, ten, or possibly twenty million dollars, and upon the reputation of which the Fine Arts Commission will live the balance of their lives?

Mr. MANN. That is not an argument, because the Aqueduct Bridge has been built, and we are still talking about the memorial bridge, but we put through Congress a provision two and a half years ago providing for a commission and plans to be drawn for a memorial bridge; but at that time it was not known there was anything specially the matter with the Aqueduct Bridge. We will build a memorial bridge in the course of time. Now, we had a little controversy going on a little while ago about the Fine Arts Commission in reference to the location of the power plant. I drove down there last night. Now, a commission of the members of the Architects' Institute or anybody else, whether they be Members of the House or the Senate, that will go and look at the site again for the proposed power plant and then insist that that site shall be subject to review by the Fine Arts Commission, as gentlemen are insisting, will certainly readily admit that no site, even for a bridge, can be selected without the approval of the Fine Arts Commission, which under the law must first approve the plans for the bridge; and, gentlemen, when they talk about a million-dollar bridge there with just a little turn in it, why, the probabilities are that before this bridge gets through the Fine Arts Commission it will rove around in curves back and forth more like the letter "S" than like a straight bridge.

Mr. SIMS. Has Congress the power to abolish this Fine Arts Commission?

Mr. MANN. The Congress has power, but it is not going to abolish the Fine Arts Commission. I am not endeavoring to reflect upon the Fine Arts Commission, except in reference to this power plant, and there, I think, they do not know what they are doing. I think the Fine Arts Commission will insist, and ought to insist, possibly, upon plans for this bridge, but you will not build it within a million dollars.

Mr. ESCH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. I will.

Mr. ESCH. Is it contemplated that this bridge will be under the jurisdiction of the Fine Arts Commission, it not being wholly in the District of Columbia, but between the District of Columbia and the State of Virginia?

Mr. MANN. It is wholly in the District of Columbia.

Mr. ESCH. Not the District of Columbia.

Mr. MANN. Oh, yes; all in the District of Columbia.

Mr. ESCH. Is not a little of it in Virginia?

Mr. CARLIN. And yet they want Virginia to pay for it.

Mr. ESCH. It is not wholly within the District of Columbia?

Mr. MANN. The approach on the Virginia side is under the control of the State of Virginia, but the bridge is wholly in the District of Columbia. I think that the District line runs over high-water mark on the other side; but that would not make any difference. A part is in the District of Columbia, and when we are paying for it on the ground that it is in the District of Columbia that is probably a sufficient reason for saying that it is in the District of Columbia.

Mr. CARLIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. I will yield to the gentleman from Virginia, although I would like to get along.

Mr. CARLIN. I want to say to the gentleman, in the light of what has transpired, that if in the wisdom of the Fine Arts Commission, the Secretary of War, and others it would require a larger sum of money to build a proper structure, then I will certainly join with the gentleman from Illinois in trying to secure it, if necessary.

Mr. MANN. Well, I think the gentleman meant to say that he certainly hoped the gentleman from Illinois would join with him in endeavoring to secure it.

Mr. CARLIN. Well, I understood the gentleman to say he did not want anything omitted that ought to be there.

Mr. MANN. I do not want anything omitted that ought to be incorporated, but I think before we undertake these things, as a rule, at least we ought to know what we are doing and something about what it will cost. Now, this bill provides nothing in reference to power-plant companies, electric companies, or gas companies.

Mr. CARLIN. It does as reported, but it does not as introduced.

Mr. MANN. Where is it?

Mr. CARLIN. In the substitute.

Mr. MANN. Where in the substitute—oh, I see, on conditions—but that does not require the payment of rent.

Mr. CARLIN. It leaves that to the Secretary of War.

Mr. MANN. I do not know whether it does or not.

Mr. CARLIN (quoting):

That the said bridge shall be used as a highway for traffic, and for gas and water mains, power, telegraph and telephone wires and cables—

And so forth.

Mr. MANN. Does that authorize the Secretary of War to exact a rental?

Mr. CARLIN. It is proposed by the amendment, I think, which is suggested by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] to strike out the language below, which would put it in the power of the Secretary of War, I think, to fix the terms. If it does not, it ought to do so.

Mr. MANN. I have found some difficulty in this. Here is a bill introduced and another bill reported. The gentleman refers to amendments that have been agreed upon that entirely change the substance of both bills. Those, of course, I do not know about and can not discuss. I would like to ask this about the bill: Section 3 of the bill authorizes the Secretary of War to contract for the removal of the present bridge and for the sale thereof. Section 5 makes an appropriation out of the National Treasury for the removal of the bridge. The last section of the bill provides for another appropriation for the maintenance of the bridge. That I can understand. Now, how is this bridge to be removed? At Government expense or by contract or at the expense of the contractor?

Mr. CARLIN. I think the bill anticipates that the Government would have the right to sell the bridge and provide for its removal by the person to whom it was sold.

Mr. MANN. Why should we make provision for the Government to remove it?

Mr. CARLIN. In the event there should be no purchaser, the Government would have to do this.

Mr. MANN. It is very evident that nobody has made much investigation to ascertain what you could do.

Mr. CARLIN. Not in reference to the sale of the bridge.

Mr. MANN. It is easy to ascertain whether this bridge can be sold or moved by contract, or not. It does not require very much learning to know that.

Mr. CARLIN. I tried to ascertain it, and the best I could find out about it was that it was probable that a purchaser might be found.

Mr. MANN. Is this bridge intended to be used all the time while the new bridge is under construction?

Mr. CARLIN. It will have to be used while the new bridge is under construction.

Mr. MANN. And anybody knows you can not come and ask for the removal and sale of it.

Mr. CARLIN. Why not?

Mr. MANN. It will have to be taken away piecemeal.

Mr. CARLIN. Only at the approaches.

Mr. MANN. If you erect a new bridge over this line, put in your foundations, and so forth, you have got to remove your bridge part at a time when you put up the new bridge.

Mr. CARLIN. Not if you build to the east or west of the new bridge.

Mr. MANN. It is not possible to build on the Virginia side, I guess, is it, either east or west?

Mr. CARLIN. Oh, yes; the Government can go either way.

Mr. MANN. Is it proposed to do that? Does the gentleman know, or are there any plans enough to know, whether it is proposed to build a new bridge either east or west of this, or build it where this bridge now is?

Mr. CARLIN. I think there has been enough said about it by those who would have the building of the bridge so that a very clear idea is had as to what will be done.

Mr. MANN. What will be done? Tell us.

Mr. CARLIN. I will tell you. Somewhere between Thirty-fourth Street and the present site will be found an approach for the new bridge. Of course it depends upon the soundings that will have to be made by the War Department for foundations, and so forth, and depending further upon the desirability of approaches from the section where the bridge would most likely land.

Mr. MANN. Do not make it too long. I would like to get at the point.

Mr. CARLIN. I am through with it.

Mr. MANN. Is it intended, in the gentleman's opinion, regardless of anything else, that the present bridge shall remain there while they are constructing the new bridge?

Mr. CARLIN. Yes, sir.

Mr. MANN. Then why do you make an appropriation now to remove the old bridge before you commence an appropriation to build a new bridge? Of all the ridiculous things I ever heard about, to bring a bill in here to furnish a new bridge, which does not even contain an appropriation for a new bridge, but does contain an appropriation for the removal of the old bridge, and the gentleman says the old bridge is not to be removed until the new bridge is completed, which will be years hence.

Mr. CARLIN. Well, I think the gentleman is a little ahead of what the bill provides for.

Mr. MANN. Oh, no; not nearly as far ahead as this bill for the removal of the old bridge is ahead.

Mr. CARLIN. The same paragraph that provides for the removal of the old bridge provides for the approaches of the new bridge. The money is not exclusively for that purpose, but is so intended, if any portion of it is needed. It might be used for that purpose. My own belief is that the Government will receive something in addition to the cost of removal by exposing the present bridge to public auction.

Mr. MANN. I read from section 5:

> That the sum of $300,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purpose of securing proper plans and for the payment of any lands, easements, rights, or property, and for the removal of the present structure.

Yet the gentleman says the present structure is not to be removed until the new structure is completed, and he has no appropriation here for the new structure.

Mr. CARLIN. No appropriation for the new structure?

Mr. MANN. No.

Mr. CARLIN. Then I suggest that it be put in.

Mr. MANN. That is a part of this item, and it is proposed to reduce that, as suggested by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON], so that there would be no appropriation for that purpose. Where is the appropriation for the new bridge?

Mr. CARLIN. For the million dollars?

Mr. MANN. Yes. Where is it?

Mr. CARLIN. I think the gentleman is possibly correct. The authorization is there. I think an appropriation ought to be included in this bill.

Mr. MANN. Well, now, that is another thing. What ought to be done, in the opinion of my distinguished friend from Virginia——

Mr. CARLIN. It is suggested to me that the appropriation will be carried in an appropriation bill.

Mr. MANN. I suggest that it would be just as easy to carry in a general appropriation bill an appropriation to remove the present structure as it is to carry in a general appropriation bill an appropriation for the new structure.

M. CARLIN. I have no objection to that.

Mr. MANN. It just shows how carelessly the bill has been prepared. It provides in one section that the contractors shall remove the old bridge. It provides in another section that the Government shall remove it at its own expense; and it makes an appropriation for the removal but not for the commencement of new construction.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Does not the gentleman notice that an appropriation of $300,000 is made to commence new construction?

Mr. MANN. My friend from New Jersey was not in the Hall when this was discussed. It has been proposed in the committee to strike out all that in connection with the commencement of the new structure. I am sorry to have detained the committee so long. I reserve the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] reserves 20 minutes.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina rose and was recognized.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not recognize the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON], because he has been previously recognized.

Mr. ADAMSON. I wanted to sound the committee on the tendency on general debate, with a view to ascertaining whether there is any prospect of reading the bill this evening.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I will say to the chairman of the committee that I do not propose to occupy the entire hour which is my right under recognition.

Mr. ADAMSON. I do not know, if I should move to rise, whether the committee would stay risen.

Mr. MANN. How much time does the gentleman desire to occupy?

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Not more than 15 minutes, unless some gentlemen become more inquisitive than I think they will.

Mr. MANN. Suppose we agree upon half an hour of general debate for the gentleman, and then rise?

Mr. ADAMSON. And then start reading the bill.

Mr. MANN. I mean rise now, and have half an hour's debate later.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I would be glad if we could finish the debate and start reading the bill, and then rise.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, is this taken from my hour?

The CHAIRMAN. It is not.

Mr. MANN. I will yield time to the gentleman if he desires.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent, then, that general debate end in 30 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would like to ask, if the agreement goes through, is it desired to determine who shall control the time?

Mr. ADAMSON. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. PAGE] would control it.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from North Carolina will have the control, but it could be arranged very easily.

Mr. ADAMSON. How much time does the gentleman from North Carolina desire to take?

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Fifteen minutes.

Mr. ADAMSON. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. RAGSDALE] wants 15 minutes. The general debate will end in one hour.

Mr. MANN. One hour's general debate, at the end of which time debate shall cease.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will put the request as it is submitted to the Chair. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent that the general debate close in one hour. Is there objection?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, will the gentleman from Georgia indicate whether he wants to press this bill to its passage to-night?

Mr. ADAMSON. I should be glad to do so, but it has been intimated to me that I will have some trouble in doing it, so I may move that the committee rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent that the general debate on the bill be closed in one hour. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that if he is in the chair when this bill comes up again for consideration he will recognize the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. PAGE].

Mr. ADAMSON. Let us have an understanding about who will use the hour.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from North Carolina understands that there are two gentlemen who are to have 15 minutes apiece.

Mr. ADAMSON. I suppose if the gentleman from Illinois or myself should want any time, the gentleman from North Carolina would give it to us.

Mr. PAGE. I am sure there will be no trouble about that.

Mr. MANN. I suggest to the gentleman that there is no quorum here now.

Mr. ADAMSON. The only reason why I suggested that I might want to say something is that some one might ask me a question that I might want to elucidate.

I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CRISP, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 759) to provide for the removal of what is now known as the Aqueduct Bridge across the Potomac River and for the building of a bridge in place thereof, and had come to no resolution thereon.

DAMS ACROSS THE SAVANNAH RIVER.

Mr. VINSON. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. VINSON. To endeavor to get unanimous consent or to suspend the rules to secure consideration for the bill (H. R. 157) to extend the time for the completion of dams across the Savannah River by authority granted to Twin City Power Co. by an act approved February 29, 1908, as amended by act approved June 3, 1912.

Mr. MANN. Oh, Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. VINSON. Then I will withdraw my request.

Mr. CRISP. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. VINSON. I ask the gentleman from Illinois to withhold his point.

Mr. MANN. I withdraw the point of no quorum.

Mr. CRISP. I withdraw my motion.

Mr. MANN. But I will not withdraw it if you want to bring up any other bill to-night.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. VINSON] rise?

Mr. VINSON. It is my desire to make a motion to suspend the rules.

Mr. MANN. Then I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois makes the point of order that there is no quorum present.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. CRISP. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. ADAMSON. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. Two gentlemen from Georgia move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 13 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, February 22, 1916, at 12 o'clock noon.

WASHINGTON'S FAREWELL ADDRESS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The recess order of last night has interfered with the regular order of the Senate. Unless there be some objection, the Chair proposes now to carry out the ancient order of the Senate of the United States. Is there any objection? [After a pause.]

The Chair is glad that this is the 22d day of February. In a time of stress and tumult, when men mad with the lust of passion and of war are seeking to tear up the ancient landmarks of civilization, remove the lighthouses and the buoys, when men of jaundiced eye are wondering whether this Republic of ours can long endure upon the principles on which our forefathers founded it, when every man, however patriotic he may be, is liable to misinterpretation and misjudgment in any and every thing that he may say, it is fit and proper that the great father of the Republic should be honored and revered in the United States Senate Chamber and that the concentrated wisdom of his lifetime in helping to form this Republic of ours and bequeathed to the future generations of the Republic in his farewell address should be listened to not only by the Senate of the United States, but by the people of the Republic.

The Chair has designated Senator JOHNSON of Maine to read this address.

Mr. JOHNSON of Maine read the address, as follows:

WASHINGTON'S FAREWELL ADDRESS.

To the People of the United States.

FRIENDS AND FELLOW CITIZENS: The period for a new election of a citizen to administer the executive government of the United States being not far distant, and the time actually arrived when your thoughts must be employed in designating the person who is to be clothed with that important trust, it appears to me proper, especially as it may conduce to a more distinct expression of the public voice, that I should now apprise you of the resolution I have formed to decline being considered among the number of those out of whom a choice is to be made.

I beg you at the same time to do me the justice to be assured that this resolution has not been taken without a strict regard to all the considerations appertaining to the relation which binds a dutiful citizen to his country; and that in withdrawing the tender of service, which silence in my situation might imply, I am influenced by no diminution of zeal for your future interest, no deficiency of grateful respect for your past kindness, but am supported by a full conviction that the step is compatible with both.

The acceptance of and continuance hitherto in the office to which your suffrages have twice called me have been a uniform sacrifice of inclination to the opinion of duty and to a deference for what appeared to be your desire. I constantly hoped that it would have been much earlier in my power, consistently with motives which I was not at liberty to disregard, to return to that retirement from which I had been reluctantly drawn. The strength of my inclination to do this previous to the last election had even led to the preparation of an address to declare it to you, but mature reflection on the then perplexed and critical posture of our affairs with foreign nations and the unanimous advice of persons entitled to my confidence impelled me to abandon the idea.

I rejoice that the state of your concerns, external as well as internal, no longer renders the pursuit of inclination incompatible with the sentiment of duty or propriety; and am persuaded, whatever partiality may be retained for my services, that in the present circumstances of our country you will not disapprove my determination to retire.

The impressions with which I first undertook the arduous trust were explained on the proper occasion. In the discharge of this trust I will only say that I have, with good intentions, contributed toward the organization and administration of the Government the best exertions of which a very fallible judgment was capable. Not unconscious in the outset of the inferiority of my qualifications, experience, in my own eyes, perhaps still more in the eyes of others, has strengthened the motives to diffidence of myself; and every day the increasing weight of years admonishes me more and more that the shade of retirement is as necessary to me as it will be welcome. Satisfied that if any circumstances have given peculiar value to my services they were temporary, I have the consolation to believe that, while choice and prudence invite me to quit the political scene, patriotism does not forbid it.

In looking forward to the movement which is to terminate the career of my political life my feelings do not permit me to suspend the deep acknowledgment of that debt of gratitude which I owe to my beloved country for the many honors it has conferred upon me; still more for the steadfast confidence with which it has supported me; and for the opportunities I have thence enjoyed of manifesting my inviolable attachment, by services faithful and persevering, though in usefulness unequal to my zeal. If benefits have resulted to our country from these services, let it always be remembered to your praise, and as an instructive example in our annals, that under circumstances in which the passions, agitated in every direction, were liable to mislead amidst appearances sometimes dubious, vicissitudes of fortune often discouraging—in situations in which not unfrequently want of success has countenanced the spirit of criticism—the constancy of your support was the essential prop of the efforts and a guaranty of the plans by which they were effected. Profoundly penetrated with this idea, I shall carry it with me to my grave as a strong incitement to unceasing vows that heaven may continue to you the choicest tokens of its beneficence; that your union and brotherly affection may be perpetual; that the free Constitution, which is the work of your hands, may be sacredly maintained; that its administration in every department may be stamped with wisdom and virtue; that, in fine, the happiness of the people of these States, under the auspices of liberty, may be made complete by so careful a preservation and so prudent a use of this blessing as will acquire to them the glory of recommending it to the applause, the affection, and adoption of every nation which is yet a stranger to it.

Here, perhaps, I ought to stop. But a solicitude for your welfare, which can not end but with my life, and the apprehension of danger, natural to that solicitude, urge me, on an occasion like the present, to offer to your solemn contemplation, and to recommend to your frequent review some sentiments which are the result of much reflection, of no inconsiderable observation, and which appear to me all important to the permanency of your felicity as a people. These will be offered to you with the more freedom, as you can only see in them the disinterested warnings of a parting friend, who can possibly have no personal motive to bias his counsel. Nor can I forget, as an encouragement to it, your indulgent reception of my sentiments on a former and not dissimilar occasion.

Interwoven as is the love of liberty with every ligament of your hearts, no recommendation of mine is necessary to fortify or confirm the attachment.

The unity of government which constitutes you one people is also now dear to you. It is justly so; for it is a main pillar in the edifice of your real independence; the support of your tranquillity at home; your peace abroad; of your safety; of your prosperity; of that very liberty which you so highly prize. But as it is easy to foresee that from different causes and from different quarters much pains will be taken, many artifices employed, to weaken in your minds the conviction of this truth; as this is the point in your political fortress against which the batteries of internal and external enemies will be most constantly and actively, though often covertly and insidiously, directed; it is of infinite moment that you should properly estimate the immense value of your national union to your collective and individual happiness; that you should cherish a cordial, habitual, and immovable attachment to it; accustoming yourselves to think and speak of it as of the palladium of your political safety and prosperity; watching for its preservation with jealous anxiety; discountenancing whatever may suggest even a suspicion that it can, in any event, be abandoned; and indignantly frowning upon the first dawning of every attempt to alienate any portion of our country from the rest, or to enfeeble the sacred ties which now link together the various parts.

For this you have every inducement of sympathy and interest. Citizens by birth, or choice, of a common country, that country has a right to concentrate your affections. The name of American, which belongs to you in your national capacity, must always exalt the just pride of patriotism, more than any appellation derived from local discriminations. With slight shades of difference, you have the same religion, manners, habits, and political principles. You have, in a common cause, fought and triumphed together; the independence and liberty you possess are the work of joint counsels and joint efforts, of common dangers, sufferings, and success.

But these considerations, however powerfully they address themselves to your sensibility, are greatly outweighed by those which apply more immediately to your interest. Here every portion of our country finds the most commanding motives for carefully guarding and preserving the union of the whole.

The North, in an unrestrained intercourse with the South, protected by the equal laws of a common Government, finds in the productions of the latter great additional resources of maritime and commercial enterprise and precious materials of manufacturing industry. The South, in the same intercourse, benefiting by the same agency of the North, sees its agriculture grow and its commerce expand. Turning partly into its own channels the seamen of the North, it finds its particular navigation invigorated, and while it contributes in different ways to nourish and increase the general mass of the national navigation, it looks forward to the protection of a maritime strength, to which itself is unequally adapted. The East, in a like intercourse with the West, already finds, and in the progressive improvement of interior communications by land and water will more and more find, a valuable vent for the commodities which it brings from abroad or manufactures at home. The West derives from the East supplies requisite to its growth and comfort; and what is perhaps of still greater consequence, it must of necessity owe the secure enjoyment of indispensable outlets for its own productions to the weight, influence, and the future maritime strength of the Atlantic side of the Union, directed by an indissoluble community of interest as one Nation. Any other tenure by which the West can hold this essential advantage, whether derived from its own separate strength or from an apostate and unnatural connection with any foreign power, must be intrinsically precarious.

While, then, every part of our country thus feels an immediate and particular interest in union, all the parts combined can not fail to find in the united mass of means and efforts greater strength, greater resource, proportionably greater security from external danger, a less frequent interruption of their peace by foreign nations, and, what is of inestimable value, they must derive from union an exemption from those broils and wars between themselves which so frequently afflict neighboring countries not tied together by the same government, which their own rivalship alone would be sufficient to produce, but which opposite foreign alliances, attachments, and intrigues would stimulate and embitter. Hence, likewise, they will avoid the necessity of those overgrown military establishments, which under any form of government are inauspicious to liberty and which are to be regarded as particularly hostile to republican liberty. In this sense it is that your union ought to be considered as a main prop of your liberty and that the love of the one ought to endear to you the preservation of the other.

These considerations speak a persuasive language to every reflecting and virtuous mind, and exhibit the continuance of the Union as a primary object of patriotic desire. Is there a doubt whether a common government can embrace so large a sphere? Let experience solve it. To listen to mere speculation in such a case were criminal. We are authorized to hope that a proper organization of the whole, with the auxiliary agency of governments for the respective subdivisions, will afford a happy issue to the experiment. It is well worth a fair and full experiment. With such powerful and obvious motives to union, affecting all parts of our country, while experience shall not have demonstrated its impracticability, there will always be reason to distrust the patriotism of those who, in any quarter, may endeavor to weaken its hands.

In contemplating the causes which may disturb our Union, it occurs as matter of serious concern that any ground should have been furnished for characterizing parties by geographical discriminations, northern and southern, Atlantic and western, whence designing men may endeavor to excite a belief that there is a real difference of local interests and views. One of the expedients of party to acquire influence within particular districts is to misrepresent the opinions and aims of other districts. You can not shield yourselves too much against the jealousies and heartburnings which spring from these misrepresentations; they tend to render alien to each other those who ought to be bound together by fraternal affection. The inhabitants of our western country have lately had a useful lesson on this head; they have seen, in the negotiation by the Executive, and in the unanimous ratification by the Senate of the treaty with Spain, and in the universal satisfaction at the event throughout the United States, a decisive proof how unfounded were the suspicions propagated among them of a policy in the General Government and in the Atlantic States unfriendly to their interests in regard to the Mississippi. They have been witnesses to the formation of two treaties, that with Great Britain and that with Spain, which secure to them everything they could desire, in respect to our foreign relations, toward confirming their prosperity. Will it not be their wisdom to rely for the preservation of these advantages on the union by which they were procured? Will they not henceforth be deaf to those advisers, if such they are, who would sever them from their brethren and connect them with aliens?

To the efficacy and permanency of your Union, a government for the whole is indispensable. No alliances, however strict, between the parts can be an adequate substitute; they must inevitably experience the infractions and interruptions which all alliances, in all times, have experienced. Sensible of this momentous truth, you have improved upon your first essay, by the adoption of a constitution of government, better calculated than your former, for an intimate union, and for the efficacious management of your common concerns. This government, the offspring of our own choice, uninfluenced and unawed, adopted upon full investigation and mature deliberation, completely free in its principles, in the distribution of its powers, uniting security with energy, and containing within itself a provision for its own amendment, has a just claim to your confidence and your support. Respect for its authority, compliance with its laws, acquiescence in its measures, are duties enjoined by the fundamental maxims of true liberty. The basis of our political systems is the right of the people to make and to alter their constitutions of government. But the constitution which at any time exists, until changed by an explicit and authentic act of the whole people, is sacredly obligatory upon all. The very idea of the power, and the right of the people to establish government, presuppose the duty of every individual to obey the established government.

All obstructions to the execution of the laws, all combinations and associations under whatever plausible character, with the real design to direct, control, counteract, or awe the regular deliberations and action of the constituted authorities, are destructive of this fundamental principle, and of fatal tendency. They serve to organize faction, to give it an artificial and extraordinary force, to put in the place of the delegated will of the Nation the will of party, often a small but artful and enterprising minority of the community; and, according to the alternate triumphs of different parties, to make the public administration the mirror of the ill concerted and incongruous projects of faction, rather than the organ of consistent and wholesome plans digested by common councils, and modified by mutual interests.

However, combinations or associations of the above description may now and then answer popular ends, they are likely, in the course of time and things, to become potent engines, by which cunning, ambitious, and unprincipled men will be enabled to subvert the power of the people, and to usurp for themselves the reins of government; destroying afterwards the very engines which have lifted them to unjust dominion.

Toward the preservation of your government and the permanency of your present happy state, it is requisite not only that you steadily discountenance irregular opposition to its acknowledged authority but also that you resist with care the spirit of innovation upon its principles, however specious the pretext. One method of assault may be to effect, in the forms of the Constitution, alterations which will impair the energy of the system; and thus to undermine what can not be directly overthrown. In all the changes to which you may be invited, remember that time and habit are at least as necessary to fix the true character of governments as of other human institutions; that experience is the surest standard by which to test the real tendency of the existing constitution of a country; that facility in changes, upon the credit of mere hypothesis and opinion, exposes to perpetual change from the endless variety of hypothesis and opinion, and remember, especially, that for the efficient management of your common interests in a country so extensive as ours, a government of as much vigor as is consistent with the perfect security of liberty is indispensable. Liberty itself will find in such a government, with powers properly distributed and adjusted, its surest guardian. It is, indeed, little else than a name where the government is too feeble to withstand the enterprises of faction, to confine each member of the society within the limits prescribed by the laws, and to maintain all in the secure and tranquil enjoyment of the rights of person and property.

I have already intimated to you the danger of parties in the State, with particular references to the founding them on geographical discrimination. Let me now take a more comprehensive view, and warn you in the most solemn manner against the baneful effects of the spirit of party generally.

This spirit, unfortunately, is inseparable from our nature, having its root in the strongest passions of the human mind. It exists under different shapes in all governments, more or less stifled, controlled, or repressed; but in those of the popular form it is seen in its greatest rankness, and is truly their worst enemy.

The alternate domination of one faction over another, sharpened by the spirit of revenge natural to party dissension, which in different ages and countries has perpetrated the most horrid enormities, is itself a frightful despotism. But this leads at length to a more formal and permanent despotism. The disorders and miseries which result gradually incline the minds of men to seek security and repose in the absolute power of an individual; and sooner or later the chief of some prevailing faction, more able or more fortunate than his competitors, turns this disposition to the purpose of his own elevation on the ruins of public liberty.

Without looking forward to an extremity of this kind, which nevertheless ought not to be entirely out of sight, the common and continual mischiefs of the spirit of party are sufficient to make it the interest and duty of a wise people to discourage and restrain it.

It serves always to distract the public councils and enfeeble the public administration. It agitates the community with ill-founded jealousies and false alarms; kindles the animosity of one part against another; foments occasional riot and insurrection. It opens the door to foreign influence and corruption, which finds a facilitated access to the Government itself through the channels of party passions. Thus the policy and the will of one country are subjected to the policy and will of another.

There is an opinion that parties in free countries are useful checks upon the administration of the government, and serve to keep alive the spirit of liberty. This within certain limits is probably true, and in governments of a monarchial cast patriotism may look with indulgence, if not with favor, upon the spirit of party. But in those of the popular character in governments purely elective it is a spirit not to be encouraged. From their natural tendency it is certain there will always be enough of that spirit for every salutary purpose. And there being constant danger of excess the effort ought to be, by force of public opinion, to mitigate and assuage it. A fire not to be quenched, it demands a uniform vigilance to prevent it bursting into a flame, lest instead of warming it should consume.

It is important likewise that the habits of thinking in a free country should inspire caution in those intrusted with its administration, to confine themselves within their respective constitutional spheres, avoiding in the exercise of the powers of one department to encroach upon another. The spirit of encroachment tends to consolidate the powers of all the departments in one, and thus to create, whatever the form of government, a real despotism. A just estimate of that love of power and proneness to abuse it which predominate in the human heart is sufficient to satisfy us of the truth of this position. The necessity of reciprocal checks in the exercise of political power, by dividing and distributing it into different depositories, and constituting each the guardian of the public weal against invasions of the others, has been evinced by experiments ancient and modern—some of them in our country and under our own eyes. To preserve them must be as necessary as to institute them. If, in the opinion of the people, the distribution or modification of the constitutional powers be in any particular wrong, let it be corrected by an amendment in the way which the Constitution designates. But let there be no change by usurpation, for though this, in one instance, may be the instrument of good, it is the customary weapon by which free governments are destroyed. The precedent must always greatly overbalance in permanent evil any partial or transient benefit which the use can at any time yield.

Of all the dispositions and habits which lead to political prosperity, religion and morality are indispensable supports. In vain would that man claim the tribute of patriotism who should labor to subvert these great pillars of human happiness, these firmest props of the duties of men and citizens. The mere politician, equally with the pious man, ought to respect and to cherish them. A volume could not trace all their connections with private and public felicity. Let it simply be asked where is the security for property, for reputation, for life, if the sense of religious obligation desert the oaths which are the instruments of investigation in courts of justice? And let us with caution indulge the supposition that morality can be maintained without religion. Whatever may be conceded to the influence of refined education on minds of peculiar structure, reason and experience both forbid us to expect that national morality can prevail in exclusion of religious principle.

It is substantially true that virtue or morality is a necessary spring of popular government. The rule, indeed, extends with more or less force to every species of free government. Who that is a sincere friend to it can look with indifference upon attempts to shake the foundation of the fabric?

Promote, then, as an object of primary importance, institutions for the general diffusion of knowledge. In proportion as the structure of a government gives force to public opinion, it should be enlightened.

As a very important source of strength and security, cherish public credit. One method of preserving it is to use it as sparingly as possible, avoiding occasions of expense by cultivating peace, but remembering, also, that timely disbursements, to prepare for danger, frequently prevent much greater disbursements to repel it; avoiding likewise the accumulation of debt, not only by shunning occasions of expense, but by vigorous exertions, in time of peace, to discharge the debts which unavoidable wars may have occasioned, not ungenerously throwing upon posterity the burden which we ourselves ought to bear. The execution of these maxims belongs to your representatives, but it is necessary that public opinion should cooperate. To facilitate to them the performance of their duty, it is essential that you should practically bear in mind that toward the payment of debts there must be revenue; that to have revenue there must be taxes; that no taxes can be devised which are not more or less inconvenient and unpleasant; that the intrinsic embarrassment inseparable from the selection of the proper object (which is always a choice of difficulties) ought to be a decisive motive for a candid construction of the conduct of the Government in making it, and for a spirit of acquiescence in the measures for obtaining revenue which the public exigencies may at any time dictate.

Observe good faith and justice toward all nations; cultivate peace and harmony with all. Religion and morality enjoin this conduct, and can it be that good policy does not equally enjoin it? It will be worthy of a free, enlightened, and, at no distant period, a great nation, to give to mankind the magnanimous and too novel example of a people always guided by an exalted justice and benevolence. Who can doubt but, in the course of time and things, the fruits of such a plan would richly repay any temporary advantages which might be lost by a steady adherence to it; can it be that Providence has not connected the permanent felicity of a nation with its virtue? The experiment, at least, is recommended by every sentiment which ennobles human nature. Alas! is it rendered impossible by its vices?

In the execution of such a plan nothing is more essential than that permanent, inveterate antipathies against particular nations and passionate attachments for others, should be excluded; and that, in place of them, just and amicable feelings toward all should be cultivated. The nation which indulges toward another an habitual hatred, or an habitual fondness, is in some degree a slave. It is a slave to its animosity or to its affection, either of which is sufficient to lead it astray from its duty and its interest. Antipathy in one nation against another disposes each more readily to offer insult and injury, to lay hold of slight causes of umbrage, and to be haughty and intractable when accidental or trifling occasions of dispute occur. Hence, frequent collisions, obstinate, envenomed, and bloody contests. The nation, prompted by ill will and resentment sometimes impels to war the Government, contrary to the best calculations of policy. The Government sometimes participates in the national propensity, and adopts through passion what reason would reject; at other times it makes the animosity of the nation subservient to projects of hostility, instigated by pride, ambition, and other sinister and pernicious motives. The peace often, sometimes perhaps the liberty of nations, has been the victim.

So, likewise a passionate attachment of one nation for another produces a variety of evils. Sympathy for the favorite nation, facilitating the illusion of an imaginary common interest, in cases where no real common interest exists, and infusing into one the enmities of the other, betrays the former into a participation in the quarrels and wars of the latter without adequate inducements or justifications. It leads also to concessions to the favorite nation, of privileges denied to others, which is apt doubly to injure the nation making the concessions by unnecessarily parting with what ought to have been retained and by exciting jealousy, ill will, and a disposition to retaliate in the parties from whom equal privileges are withheld; and it gives to ambitious, corrupted, or deluded citizens who devote themselves to the favorite nation facility to betray or sacrifice the interests of their own country without odium, sometimes even with popularity, gilding with the appearances of a virtuous sense of obligation a commendable deference for public opinion or a laudable zeal for public good the base or foolish compliances of ambition, corruption, or infatuation.

As avenues to foreign influence in innumerable ways, such attachments are particularly alarming to the truly enlightened and independent patriot. How many opportunities do they afford to tamper with domestic factions, to practice the arts of seduction, to mislead public opinion, to influence or awe the public councils. Such an attachment of a small or weak toward a great and powerful nation dooms the former to be the satellite of the latter.

Against the insidious wiles of foreign influence—I conjure you to believe me, fellow citizens—the jealousy of a free people ought to be constantly awake, since history and experience prove that foreign influence is one of the most baneful foes of republican government. But that jealousy, to be useful, must be impartial, else it becomes the instrument of the very influence to be avoided instead of a defense against it. Excessive partiality for one foreign nation and excessive dislike for another cause those whom they actuate to see danger only on one side and serve to veil and even second the arts of influence on the other. Real patriots who may resist the intrigues of the favorite are liable to become suspected and odious, while its tools and dupes usurp the applause and confidence of the people to surrender their interests.

The great rule of conduct for us in regard to foreign nations is, in extending our commercial relations, to have with them as little political connection as possible. So far as we have already formed engagements, let them be fulfilled with perfect good faith—here let us stop.

Europe has a set of primary interests which to us have none, or a very remote relation. Hence she must be engaged in frequent controversies, the causes of which are essentially foreign to our concerns. Hence, therefore, it must be unwise in us to implicate ourselves by artificial ties in the ordinary vicissitudes of her politics or the ordinary combinations and collisions of her friendships or enmities.

Our detached and distant situation invites and enables us to pursue a different course. If we remain one people under an efficient government, the period is not far off when we may defy material injury from external annoyance; when we may take such an attitude as will cause the neutrality we may at any time resolve upon to be scrupulously respected; when belligerent nations, under the impossibility of making acquisitions upon us, will not lightly hazard the giving us provocation; when we may choose peace or war, as our interest, guided by justice, shall counsel.

Why forego the advantages of so peculiar a situation? Why quit our own to stand upon foreign ground? Why, by interweaving our destiny with that of any part of Europe, entangle our peace and prosperity in the toils of European ambition, rivalship, interest, humor, or caprice?

It is our true policy to steer clear of permanent alliance with any portion of the foreign world; so far, I mean, as we are now at liberty to do it; for let me not be understood as capable of patronizing infidelity to existing engagements. I hold the maxim no less applicable to public than private affairs, that honesty is always the best policy. I repeat it, therefore, let those engagements be observed in their genuine sense. But in my opinion it is unnecessary and would be unwise to extend them.

Taking care always to keep ourselves by suitable establishments on a respectable defensive posture, we may safely trust to temporary alliances for extraordinary emergencies.

Harmony and a liberal intercourse with all nations are recommended by policy, humanity, and interest. But even our commercial policy should hold an equal and impartial hand; neither seeking nor granting exclusive favors or preferences; consulting the natural course of things; diffusing and diversifying by gentle means the streams of commerce, but forcing nothing; establishing with powers so disposed, in order to give trade a stable course, to define the rights of our merchants, and to enable the Government to support them, conventional rules of intercourse, the best that present circumstances and mutual opinion will permit, but temporary, and liable to be from time to time abandoned or varied as experience and circumstances shall dictate; constantly keeping in view that it is folly in one nation to look for disinterested favors from another; that it must pay with a portion of its independence for whatever it may accept under that character; that by such acceptance it may place itself in the condition of having given equivalents for nominal favors, and yet of being reproached with ingratitude for not giving more. There can be no greater error than to expect or calculate upon real favors from nation to nation. It is an illusion which experience must cure, which a just pride ought to discard.

In offering to you, my countrymen, these counsels of an old and affectionate friend I dare not hope they will make the strong and lasting impression I could wish; that they will control the usual current of the passions, or prevent our Nation from running the course which has hitherto marked the destiny of nations, but if I may even flatter myself that they may be productive of some partial benefit, some occasional good; that they may now and then recur to moderate the fury of party spirit, to warn against the mischiefs of foreign intrigue, to guard against the impostures of pretended patriotism; this hope will be a full recompense for the solicitude for your welfare by which they have been dictated.

How far in the discharge of my official duties I have been guided by the principles which have been delineated the public records and other evidences of my conduct must witness to you and to the world. To myself the assurance of my own conscience is that I have at least believed myself to be guided by them.

In relation to the still subsisting war in Europe my proclamation of the 22d of April, 1793, is the index to my plan. Sanctioned by your approving voice, and by that of your representatives in both Houses of Congress, the spirit of that measure has continually governed me, uninfluenced by any attempts to deter or divert me from it.

After deliberate examination, with the aid of the best lights I could obtain, I was well satisfied that our country, under all the circumstances of the case, had a right to take and was bound in duty and interest to take a neutral position. Having taken it, I determined, as far as should depend upon me, to maintain it with moderation, perseverance, and firmness.

The considerations which respect the right to hold this conduct it is not necessary on this occasion to detail. I will only observe that, according to my understanding of the matter, that right, so far from being denied by any of the belligerent powers, has been virtually admitted by all.

The duty of holding a neutral conduct may be inferred, without anything more, from the obligation which justice and humanity impose on every nation, in cases in which it is free to act, to maintain inviolate the relations of peace and amity toward other nations.

The inducements of interest for observing that conduct will best be referred to your own reflections and experience. With me, a predominant motive has been to endeavor to gain time to our country to settle and mature its yet recent institutions, and to progress, without interruption, to that degree of strength and consistency which is necessary to give it, humanly speaking, the command of its own fortunes.

Though in reviewing the incidents of my administration I am unconscious of intentional error, I am nevertheless too sensible of my defects not to think it probable that I may have committed many errors. Whatever they may be, I fervently beseech the Almighty to avert or mitigate the evils to which they may tend. I shall also carry with me the hope that my country will never cease to view them with indulgence, and that, after 45 years of my life dedicated to its service, with an upright zeal, the faults of incompetent abilities will be consigned to oblivion, as myself must soon be to the mansions of rest.

Relying on its kindness in this as in other things, and actuated by that fervent love toward it which is so natural to a man who views in it the native soil of himself and his progenitors for several generations, I anticipate with pleasing expectation that retreat in which I promise myself to realize, without alloy, the sweet enjoyment of partaking, in the midst of my fellow citizens, the benign influence of good laws under a free government—the ever favorite object of my heart and the happy reward, as I trust, of our mutual cares, labors, and dangers.

GO: WASHINGTON.

UNITED STATES, September 17, 1796.

RECESS.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President, I move, out of respect to the memory of Washington, that the Senate stand in recess until to-morrow at noon.

The motion was unanimously agreed to; and (at 1 o'clock and 8 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Wednesday, February 23, 1916, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, February 22, 1916.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

We bless Thee, our Father in heaven, for the spirit of hero worship resident in the heart of man, which not only inspires him with gratitude, admiration, and praise for the hero, but inspires him to go and do likewise. The history of the world, sacred and profane, clusters round its heroes, whose deeds have marked the progress of mankind in all the ages. The nation that cherishes the memory of its heroes and strives to emulate their virtues will live and increase its usefulness. To-day millions not only in the United States of America but the lovers of liberty in all the world will pour out their gratitude, admiration, and praise for our immortal Washington. A hero in war, a hero in peace, a hero in shaping the destiny of our Republic. Time has not dimmed his glory, but has added infinitely to its splendor. A stainless character, unselfish in his devotion to right, truth, and justice. His memory a challenge to patriotism, integrity, and undying faith in a God of justice, love, and mercy. We thank Thee that he thus lives in the hearts of men, in the sacred institutions of our country. May we not only honor him in our thought but in our lives, that our Republic may continue to grow in all that makes a nation great.

Our fathers' God, to Thee,
Author of liberty,
To Thee we sing;
Long may our land be bright
With freedom's holy light;
Protect us by Thy might,
Great God, our King!

Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. SHOUSE, by unanimous consent, was given leave to withdraw from the files of the House without leaving copies papers in the case of P. C. Trump, Sixty-second Congress, no adverse report having been made thereon.

POST OFFICE BUILDING AT SANDUSKY, OHIO.

Mr. OVERMYER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill S. 4308, to purchase a site and erect thereon a suitable building for post office and other governmental offices at Sandusky, Ohio, and for other purposes. It is on the Unanimous Consent Calendar but was not reached yesterday. The reason I am asking for unanimous consent is because the option upon the site upon which this building is to be erected will expire March 1, and I shall have no opportunity to call this up on unanimous consent day.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate bill 4308. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Let us have the bill reported.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That so much of section 3 of the public building act approved March 4, 1913, as authorizes the construction of a post-office building at Sandusky, Ohio, upon ground now owned by the United States, at a cost not exceeding $130,000, be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

"That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to contract for the acquisition, by purchase, condemnation, or otherwise, of a new site and for the erection and completion thereon of a suitable building, including fireproof vaults, mechanical equipment, and approaches, complete, for the use and accommodation of the post office and other governmental offices at Sandusky, Ohio, at a cost for said site and building of not exceeding $215,000.

"That the appropriations of $80,000 and $12,000 made by the act of Congress approved March 3, 1915 (38 Stats., 828), pursuant to said provision of the public building act of March 4, 1913, and for temporary quarters and moving expenses for the Government officials in the present building, be, and the same are hereby, reappropriated and made immediately available for the purchase of said new site and the commencement of said new building.

"And that the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed, upon the completion and occupancy of said new building, to sell the present public building and the site thereof in Sandusky, Ohio, at such time, in such manner, and upon such terms as he may deem advisable; to convey said property to the purchasers thereof by the usual quit-claim deed; and to deposit the proceeds of said sale in the Treasury of the United States as a miscellaneous receipt: Provided, That said property shall not be sold for less than $70,000."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman from Ohio if this increases the limit of cost of the building?

Mr. SWITZER. Does this bill carry an increase over the original bill?

Mr. OVERMYER. It carries an increase over the appropriation made three years ago, but that building was to be erected on the old site. They now have a bid of $80,000 for the old site, and there was appropriated a year ago $12,000 to erect quarters for the post office if it was built on the old site. That item will not now be necessary, so that in fact the appropriation carried in this bill will result in less cost to the Government in the end, when the old site is sold, than was considered by the original bill.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. How much less?

Mr. OVERMYER. Seven thousand dollars less.

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, I understand there is a special exigency which is the reason why the gentleman asks to call this up at this time?

Mr. OVERMYER. Yes; the options expire on the 1st day of March.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. CANTRILL. Reserving the right to object, I would like to ask if this bill has been favorably reported by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds?

Mr. OVERMYER. Yes; the bill has passed the Senate and been reported favorably by a committee of the House; it is on the Unanimous Consent Calendar, but was not reached yesterday.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. OVERMYER. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment.

Amend the bill S. 4308 by striking out all after line 2, page 1, down to and including line 4, page 2, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"United States post office at Sandusky, Ohio, $215,000: Provided, That said limit of cost shall include the purchase of a new site, which is hereby authorized, and the building herein authorized shall be erected on the new site."

Mr. MANN. The reason for offering the amendment is to change the form of the bill.

The law which it is proposed to amend is section 3, authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to erect buildings at places enumerated, and this authorization appears in one line devoted to Sandusky, Ohio: "United States post office at Sandusky, Ohio, $130,000."

The bill proposes to amend that line by inserting a long provision making a new authorization, which is unnecessary, and then adding two more paragraphs which do not belong to the original bill at all and have no relation to the original act, but which ought to be included as a new part of that legislation. If this amendment is adopted, I shall move to strike out the quotation marks of the balance of the bill and insert it as section 2.

Mr. OVERMYER. Mr. Speaker, I will accept the amendment.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

Amend, page 2, line 5, at the beginning of the line, by inserting section 2 and striking out the quotation marks on page 2, lines 5, 15, and 24.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. OVERMYER, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

DAMS ACROSS SAVANNAH RIVER.

Mr. VINSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill H. R. 157, to extend the time for the completion of dams across the Savannah River by authority granted to Twin City Power Co. by an act approved February 29, 1908, as amended by act approved June 3, 1912, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the consent of Congress is hereby granted for the extension of the time allowed to the Twin City Power Co. to construct dams across the Savannah River authorized by an act of February 29, 1908, as amended by act approved June 3, 1912, until three years from the date fixed in the amending act for its completion, to wit, February 29, 1919.

SEC. 2. That the right to amend, alter, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman from Georgia what work has been done upon this dam?

Mr. VINSON. Mr. Speaker, a million and a half of dollars have been invested in the buying of the property and in the excavation of the place where the dam is to be constructed. About 7,000 acres have been purchased along the Savannah River, extending some 20 miles in length and anywhere from 1 to 5 miles in width. All of that property has been purchased and paid for, and the power company has deeds to the property, and all flowage rights or rights that might be affected by the backing of the water have been also purchased.

Mr. FOSTER. This is to permit them to go ahead with the work?

Mr. VINSON. Yes. The time expires on the 29th, and if it is not passed now it will affect the corporation in the construction of that work.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, this is the Twin City Power Co. property?

Mr. VINSON. Yes.

Mr. RAINEY. How many times has the time been extended for the completion of this dam?

Mr. VINSON. I think it has been extended, probably, three times before; but the reason for that has been due to the fact that there was litigation extending over a period of about five years, from 1910 to 1915, and that litigation was just settled in the fall of last year. Also, there was an application made to change the plan of the construction of the dam which stayed in the War Office for a year. That litigation and the change of the plan necessarily delayed this concern in the construction of this dam.

Mr. RAINEY. How many dams are they going to build?

Mr. VINSON. One. The original act provided for the construction of two, but after consultation with the War Department and the company's engineers they decided to construct one dam, and that is the reason there has been a delay of a year.

Mr. RAINEY. Who owns the Twin City Power Co.?

Mr. VINSON. The Twin City Power Co. is a corporation incorporated under the laws of South Carolina. Mr. O'Connor, of New York, is the President of it. I do not know who the stockholders are. There is no other power company in that whole section except the Georgia-Carolina Power Co., and the object of this is to give more competition in the electrical current in that section.

Mr. RAINEY. What relation does this power company bear to the Electric Properties Co.?

Mr. VINSON. None that I know of. I am not acquainted with all of its holdings.

Mr. RAINEY. Did not the Electric Properties Co. make these investments?

Mr. VINSON. No; the Electric Properties Co. had an option on this, and this company had a litigation with the Electric Properties Co., and that brought about a delay of five years. I will state to the gentleman that the president says there has been invested actual money $1,250,000. They have done a great amount of excavation and have bought franchises into the city of Augusta.

Mr. RAINEY. Who is the president of the concern?

Mr. VINSON. Mr. O'Connor, of New York.

Mr. RAINEY. He has made so many statements that it is hard to tell which one is correct. In the first instance, he said they had invested $500,000, and then again he said over a million dollars. He made a mistake the first time of $500,000 and might have made a mistake of a million dollars the second time.

Mr. VINSON. That is substantiated by Judge Callaway, who is the attorney for this concern, and who was the partner of Justice Lamar, of the Supreme Court, and he states in his report that they have expended over $1,000,000 in the purchase of land and flowage rights, obtaining title to over 7,000 acres of land.

Mr. RAINEY. How did the president of this company happen to know so little about it that he made a mistake of $500,000 in his estimate as to the amount of money invested?

Mr. VINSON. I do not know how he made that mistake. He has the books and he should know more than the attorney, but Judge Callaway says he knows of his own knowledge that they have spent this amount.

Mr. RAINEY. What have they done except to buy land?

Mr. VINSON. Here is what they have done. I read from the report:

After the plans of the company had been approved by the War Department in 1910, the company built a spur track from the Charleston & Western Carolina Railroad over to the site of its dam, and made large excavations for the dam, and in fact carrying them down to rock bed for a foundation, cleared all of the growing timber off of the site of the pond and put a sawmill there and sawed up a large quantity of the necessary timber to be used in its concrete work in connection with its construction.

Mr. RAINEY. They have just dug a hole there.

Mr. VINSON. It has been under the supervision of the engineer of that district, and he approves it in accordance with the plans and specifications.

Mr. RAINEY. But they have had nine years, and have just dug a hole where they want to build a dam.

Mr. VINSON. Five years of that time have been in litigation and one year in the War Department. The gentleman ought to take into consideration the fact that it was hard to finance the corporation in 1909 and 1910 on account of the depressed condition of the money market.

Mr. RAINEY. Have they got it financed now?

Mr. VINSON. I think they have. They want the time extended to 1919, and at that time, if the gentleman thinks they have not done anything, he can then object, but I trust that he will withdraw his objection at this time.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Chair desires to call the attention of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. VINSON] to the last two lines of section 1 of the bill where the date February 29, 1919, is mentioned. There never will be any such date "February 29, 1919." There is no such date and never will be.

Mr. VINSON. Then, Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment making it the 28th of February, 1919.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Page 2, line 2, strike out "twenty-ninth" and insert "twenty-eighth."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. ADAMSON, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

PENSIONS.

Mr. HAYES. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from California rise?

Mr. HAYES. Mr. Speaker, I rise for the purpose of calling up House joint resolution 89, now on the Speaker's table, in order to move to concur in the Senate amendments.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the title of the joint resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

H. J. Res. 89, to amend an act entitled "An act granting pensions to certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war, approved February 25, 1915."

The Senate amendments were read.

The SPEAKER. The question is on concurring in the Senate amendments.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from California yield just a moment?

Mr. HAYES. With pleasure.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, it seems more than passing strange that, when we pass a resolution to correct a clerical error in a pension bill, we can not pass a resolution correctly, but have to leave it to the Senate to put the resolution in proper form. We made a number of mistakes in the last Congress in some special pension bills in describing the pensioners. This is one of them. We passed a joint resolution the other day to correct that, and then did not know enough to correctly describe the act which we sought to amend. I do not know who drew the resolution—I suppose a clerk, and very likely a good clerk—but it does show a carelessness on the part, possibly, of all of us that, even while we are trying to correct an error which was inexcusable in the first place, we make another one and leave that to be corrected by the Senate.

The question was taken, and the Senate amendments were concurred in.

The SPEAKER. With the consent of the House, the Chair wishes to make a remark or two about this unanimous-consent business. Some years ago the House fixed a Unanimous Consent Calendar. Under that rule the Speaker has no right even to recognize any gentleman to ask for unanimous consent unless the bill is on that calendar. What the Chair desires to say is that gentlemen who have bills and want them passed had better get them on the Unanimous Consent Calendar as quickly as they can.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Tennessee rise?

Mr. MOON. I rise to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union——

Mr. MANN. There is a special order to-day.

The SPEAKER. Under a special order of the House, the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] will read Gen. George Washington's Farewell Address. [Applause.]

Mr. RAKER, from the Clerk's desk, read the address, as follows:

WASHINGTON'S FAREWELL ADDRESS.

To the People of the United States.

FRIENDS AND FELLOW CITIZENS: The period for a new election of a citizen to administer the executive government of the United States being not far distant, and the time actually arrived when your thoughts must be employed in designating the person who is to be clothed with that important trust, it appears to me proper, especially as it may conduce to a more distinct expression of the public voice, that I should now apprise you of the resolution I have formed to decline being considered among the number of those out of whom a choice is to be made.

I beg you at the same time to do me the justice to be assured that this resolution has not been taken without a strict regard to all the considerations appertaining to the relation which binds a dutiful citizen to his country; and that in withdrawing the tender of service, which silence in my situation might imply, I am influenced by no diminution of zeal for your future interest, no deficiency of grateful respect for your past kindness, but am supported by a full conviction that the step is compatible with both.

The acceptance of and continuance hitherto in the office to which your suffrages have twice called me have been a uniform sacrifice of inclination to the opinion of duty and to a deference for what appeared to be your desire. I constantly hoped that it would have been much earlier in my power, consistently with motives which I was not at liberty to disregard, to return to that retirement from which I had been reluctantly drawn. The strength of my inclination to do this previous to the last election had even led to the preparation of an address to declare it to you; but mature reflection on the then perplexed and critical posture of our affairs with foreign nations and the unanimous advice of persons entitled to my confidence impelled me to abandon the idea. I rejoice that the state of your concerns, external as well as internal, no longer renders the pursuit of inclination incompatible with the sentiment of duty or propriety, and am persuaded, whatever partiality may be retained for my services, that in the present circumstances of our country you will not disapprove my determination to retire.

The impressions with which I first undertook the arduous trust were explained on the proper occasion. In the discharge of this trust I will only say that I have, with good intentions, contributed toward the organization and administration of the Government the best exertions of which a very fallible judgment was capable. Not unconscious in the outset of the inferiority of my qualifications, experience in my own eyes, perhaps still more in the eyes of others, has strengethed the motives to diffidence of myself; and every day the increasing weight of years admonishes me more and more that the shade of retirement is as necessary to me as it will be welcome. Satisfied that if any circumstances have given peculiar value to my services they were temporary, I have the consolation to believe that, while choice and prudence invite me to quit the political scene, patriotism does not forbid it.

In looking forward to the moment which is intended to terminate the career of my political life my feelings do not permit me to suspend the deep acknowledgment of that debt of gratitude which I owe to my beloved country for the many honors it has conferred upon me; still more for the steadfast confidence with which it has supported me, and for the opportunities I have thence enjoyed of manifesting my inviolable attachment by services faithful and persevering, though in usefulness unequal to my zeal. If benefits have resulted to our country from these services, let it always be remembered to your praise and as an instructive example in our annals that under circumstances in which the passions, agitated in every direction, were liable to mislead; amidst appearances sometimes dubious; vicissitudes of fortune often discouraging; in situations in which not unfrequently want of success has countenanced the spirit of criticism, the constancy of your support was the essential prop of the efforts and a guaranty of the plans by which they were effected. Profoundly penetrated with this idea, I shall carry it with me to my grave as a strong incitement to unceasing vows that Heaven may continue to you the choicest tokens of its beneficence; that your union and brotherly affection may be perpetual; that the free Constitution which is the work of your hands may be sacredly maintained; that its administration in every department may be stamped with wisdom and virtue; that, in fine, the happiness of the people of these States, under the auspices of liberty, may be made complete by so careful a preservation and so prudent a use of this blessing as will acquire to them the glory of recommending it to the applause, the affection, and adoption of every nation which is yet a stranger to it.

Here, perhaps, I ought to stop. But a solicitude for your welfare which can not end but with my life, and the apprehension of danger natural to that solicitude, urge me on an occasion like the present to offer to your solemn contemplation and to recommend to your frequent review some sentiments which are the result of much reflection, of no inconsiderable observation, and which appear to me all important to the permanency of your felicity as a people. These will be offered to you with the more freedom as you can only see in them the disinterested warnings of a parting friend, who can possibly have no personal motive to bias his counsel. Nor can I forget as an encouragement to it your indulgent reception of my sentiments on a former and not dissimilar occasion.

Interwoven as is the love of liberty with every ligament of your hearts, no recommendation of mine is necessary to fortify or confirm the attachment.

The unity of government which constitutes you one people is also now dear to you. It is justly so, for it is a main pillar in the edifice of your real independence, the support of your tranquillity at home, your peace abroad, of your safety, of your prosperity, of that very liberty which you so highly prize. But as it is easy to foresee that from different causes and from different quarters much pains will be taken, many artifices employed, to weaken in your minds the conviction of this truth, as this is the point in your political fortress against which the batteries of internal and external enemies will be most constantly and actively (though often covertly and insidiously) directed, it is of infinite moment that you should properly estimate the immense value of your national union to your collective and individual happiness; that you should cherish a cordial, habitual, and immovable attachment to it, accustoming yourselves to think and speak of it as of the palladium of your political safety and prosperity; watching for its preservation with jealous anxiety; discountenancing whatever may suggest even a suspicion that it can in any event be abandoned, and indignantly frowning upon the first dawning of every attempt to alienate any portion of our country from the rest or to enfeeble the sacred ties which now link together the various parts.

For this you have every inducement of sympathy and interest. Citizens by birth or choice of a common country, that country has a right to concentrate your affections. The name of American, which belongs to you in your national capacity, must always exalt the just pride of patriotism more than any appellation derived from local discriminations. With slight shades of difference, you have the same religion, manners, habits, and political principles. You have in a common cause fought and triumphed together. The independence and liberty you possess are the work of joint counsels and joint efforts, of common dangers, sufferings, and successes.

But these considerations, however powerfully they address themselves to your sensibility, are greatly outweighed by those which apply more immediately to your interest. Here every portion of our country finds the most commanding motives for carefully guarding and preserving the union of the whole.

The North, in an unrestrained intercourse with the South, protected by the equal laws of a common government, finds in the productions of the latter great additional resources of maritime and commercial enterprise and precious materials of manufacturing industry. The South, in the same intercourse, benefiting by the same agency of the North, sees its agriculture grow and its commerce expand. Turning partly into its own channels the seamen of the North, it finds its particular navigation invigorated; and while it contributes in different ways to nourish and increase the general mass of the national navigation, it looks forward to the protection of a maritime strength to which itself is unequally adapted. The East, in a like intercourse with the West, already finds, and in the progressive improvement of interior communications by land and water will more and more find, a valuable vent for the commodities which it brings from abroad or manufactures at home. The West derives from the East supplies requisite to its growth and comfort, and what is perhaps of still greater consequence, it must of necessity owe the secure enjoyment of indispensable outlets for its own productions to the weight, influence, and the future maritime strength of the Atlantic side of the Union, directed by an indissoluble community of interest as one nation. Any other tenure by which the West can hold this essential advantage, whether derived from its own separate strength or from an apostate and unnatural connection with an foreign power, must be intrinsically precarious.

While, then, every part of our country thus feels an immediate and particular interest in union, all the parts combined can not fail to find in the united mass of means and efforts greater strength, greater resource, proportionably greater security from external danger, a less frequent interruption of their peace by foreign nations, and what is of inestimable value, they must derive from union an exemption from those broils and wars between themselves which so frequently afflict neighboring countries not tied together by the same governments, which their own rivalships alone would be sufficient to produce, but which opposite foreign alliances, attachments, and intrigues would stimulate and embitter. Hence, likewise, they will avoid the necessity of those overgrown military establishments which, under any form of government, are inauspicious to liberty, and which are to be regarded as particularly hostile to republican liberty. In this sense it is that your union ought to be considered as a main prop of your liberty, and that the love of the one ought to endear to you the preservation of the other.

These considerations speak a persuasive language to every reflecting and virtuous mind, and exhibit the continuance of the Union as a primary object of patriotic desire. Is there a doubt whether a common government can embrace so large a sphere? Let experience solve it. To listen to mere speculation in such a case were criminal. We are authorized to hope that a proper organization of the whole, with the auxiliary agency of governments for the respective subdivisions, will afford a happy issue to the experiment. It is well worth a fair and full experiment. With such powerful and obvious motives to union affecting all parts of our country, while experience shall not have demonstrated its impracticability, there will always be reason to distrust the patriotism of those who in any quarter may endeavor to weaken its bands.

In contemplating the causes which may disturb our union, it occurs as matter of serious concern that any ground should have been furnished for characterizing parties by geographical discriminations—Northern and Southern, Atlantic and Western—whence designing men may endeavor to excite a belief that there is a real difference of local interests and views. One of the expedients of party to acquire influence within particular districts is to misrepresent the opinions and aims of other districts. You can not shield yourselves too much against the jealousies and heartburnings which spring from these misrepresentations; they tend to render alien to each other those who ought to be bound together by fraternal affection. The inhabitants of our western country have lately had a useful lesson on this head. They have seen in the negotiation by the Executive and in the unanimous ratification by the Senate of the treaty with Spain, and in the universal satisfaction at that event throughout the United States, a decisive proof how unfounded were the suspicions propagated among them of a policy in the General Government and in the Atlantic States unfriendly to their interests in regard to the Mississippi. They have been witnesses to the formation of two treaties—that with Great Britain and that with Spain—which secures to them everything they could desire in respect to our foreign relations toward confirming their prosperity. Will it not be their wisdom to rely for the preservation of these advantages on the union by which they were procured? Will they not henceforth be deaf to those advisers, if such they are, who would sever them from their brethren and connect them with aliens?

To the efficacy and permanency of your union a government for the whole is indispensable. No alliances, however strict, between the parts can be an adequate substitute. They must inevitably experience the infractions and interruptions which all alliances in all times have experienced. Sensible of this momentous truth, you have improved upon your first essay by the adoption of a Constitution of Government better calculated than your former for an intimate union and for the efficacious management of your common concerns. This Government, the offspring of our own choice, uninfluenced and unawed, adopted upon full investigation and mature deliberation, completely free in its principles, in the distribution of its powers, uniting security with energy, and containing within itself a provision for its own amendment, has a just claim to your confidence and your support. Respect for its authority, compliance with its laws, acquiescence in its measures, are duties enjoined by the fundamental maxims of true liberty. The basis of our political systems is the right of the people to make and to alter their constitutions of government. But the constitution which at any time exists till changed by an explicit and authentic act of the whole people is sacredly obligatory upon all. The very idea of the power and the right of the people to establish government presupposes the duty of every individual to obey the established government.

All obstructions to the execution of the laws, all combinations and associations, under whatever plausible character, with the real design to direct, control, counteract, or awe the regular deliberation and action of the constituted authorities, are destructive of this fundamental principle and of fatal tendency. They serve to organize faction; to give it an artificial and extraordinary force; to put in the place of the delegated will of the nation the will of a party, often a small but artful and enterprising minority of the community, and, according to the alternate triumphs of different parties, to make the public administration the mirror of the ill-concerted and incongruous projects of faction rather than the organ of consistent and wholesome plans, digested by common counsels and modified by mutual interests.

However combinations or associations of the above description may now and then answer popular ends, they are likely in the course of time and things to become potent engines by which cunning, ambitious, and unprincipled men will be enabled to subvert the power of the people, and to usurp for themselves the reins of government, destroying afterwards the very engines which have lifted them to unjust dominion.

Toward the preservation of your Government and the permanency of your present happy state it is requisite not only that you steadily discountenance irregular oppositions to its acknowledged authority but also that you resist with care the spirit of innovation upon its principles, however specious the pretexts. One method of assault may be to effect in the forms of the Constitution alterations which may impair the energy of the system, and thus to undermine what can not be directly overthrown. In all the changes to which you may be invited remember that time and habit are at least as necessary to fix the true character of governments as other human institutions; that experience is the surest standard by which to test the real tendency of the existing constitution of a country; that facility in changes upon the credit of mere hypothesis and opinion exposes to perpetual change from the endless variety of hypothesis and opinion; and remember especially that for the efficient management of your common interests in a country so extensive as ours a government of as much vigor as is consistent with the perfect security of liberty is indispensable. Liberty itself will find in such a government, with powers properly distributed and adjusted, its surest guardian. It is, indeed, little else than a name where the government is too feeble to withstand the enterprises of faction, to confine each member of the society within the limits prescribed by the laws, and to maintain all in the secure and tranquil enjoyment of the rights of person and property.

I have already intimated to you the danger of parties in the State, with particular reference to the founding of them on geographical discriminations. Let me now take a more comprehensive view, and warn you in the most solemn manner against the baneful effects of the spirit of party generally.

This spirit, unfortunately, is inseparable from our nature, having its root in the strongest passions of the human mind. It exists under different shapes in all governments, more or less stifled, controlled, or repressed; but in those of the popular form it is seen in its greatest rankness and is truly their worst enemy.

The alternate domination of one faction over another, sharpened by the spirit of revenge natural to party dissension, which in different ages and countries has perpetrated the most horrid enormities, is itself a frightful despotism. But this leads at length to a more formal and permanent despotism. The disorders and miseries which result gradually incline the minds of men to seek security and repose in the absolute power of an individual, and sooner or later the chief of some prevailing faction, more able or more fortunate than his competitors, turns this disposition to the purposes of his own elevation on the ruins of public liberty.

Without looking forward to an extremity of this kind (which nevertheless ought not to be entirely out of sight), the common and continual mischiefs of the spirit of party are sufficient to make it the interest and duty of a wise people to discourage and restrain it.

It serves always to distract the public councils and enfeeble the public administration. It agitates the community with ill-founded jealousies and false alarms; kindles the animosity of one part against another; foments occasionally riot and insurrection. It opens the door to foreign influence and corruption, which find a facilitated access to the Government itself through the channels of party passion. Thus the policy and the will of one country are subjected to the policy and will of another.

There is an opinion that parties in free countries are useful checks upon the administration of the Government and serve to keep alive the spirit of liberty. This within certain limits is probably true, and in governments of a monarchical cast patriotism may look with indulgence, if not with favor, upon the spirit of party. But in those of the popular character, in governments purely elective, it is a spirit not to be encouraged. From their natural tendency it is certain there will always be enough of that spirit for every salutary purpose, and there being constant danger of excess, the effort ought to be by force of public opinion to mitigate and assuage it. A fire not to be quenched, it demands a uniform vigilance to prevent its bursting into a flame, lest instead of warming it should consume.

It is important, likewise, that the habits of thinking in a free country should inspire caution in those intrusted with its administration to confine themselves within their respective constitutional spheres, avoiding in the exercise of the powers of one department to encroach upon another. The spirit of encroachment tends to consolidate the powers of all the departments in one, and thus to create, whatever the form of government, a real despotism. A just estimate of that love of power and proneness to abuse it which predominates in the human heart is sufficient to satisfy us of the truth of this position. The necessity of reciprocal checks in the exercise of political power, by dividing and distributing it into different depositories, and constituting each the guardian of the public weal against invasions by the others, has been evinced by experiments, ancient and modern, some of them in our country and under our own eyes. To preserve them must be as necessary as to institute them. If in the opinion of the people the distribution or modification of the constitutional powers be in any particular wrong, let it be corrected by an amendment in the way which the Constitution designates. But let there be no change by usurpation; for though this in one instance may be the instrument of good, it is the customary weapon by which free governments are destroyed. The precedent must always greatly overbalance in permanent evil any partial or transient benefit which the use can at any time yield.

Of all the dispositions and habits which lead to political prosperity, religion and morality are indispensable supports. In vain would that man claim the tribute of patriotism who should labor to subvert these great pillars of human happiness—these firmest props of the duties of men and citizens. The mere politician, equally with the pious man, ought to respect and to cherish them. A volume could not trace all their connections with private and public felicity. Let it simply be asked, Where is the security for property, for reputation, for life, if the sense of religious obligation desert the oaths which are the instruments of investigation in courts of justice? And let us with caution indulge the supposition that morality can be maintained without religion. Whatever may be conceded to the influence of refined education on minds of peculiar structure, reason and experience both forbid us to expect that national morality can prevail in exclusion of religious principle.

It is substantially true that virtue or morality is a necessary spring of popular government. The rule indeed extends with more or less force to every species of free government. Who that is a sincere friend to it can look with indifference upon attempts to shake the foundation of the fabric? Promote, then, as an object of primary importance, institutions for the general diffusion of knowledge. In proportion as the structure of a government gives force to public opinion, it is essential that public opinion should be enlightened.

As a very important source of strength and security cherish public credit. One method of preserving it is to use it as sparingly as possible, avoiding occasions of expense by cultivating peace, but remembering also that timely disbursements to prepare for danger frequently prevent much greater disbursements to repel it; avoiding likewise the accumulation of debt, not only by shunning occasions of expense, but by vigorous exertions in time of peace to discharge the debts which unavoidable wars have occasioned, not ungenerously throwing upon posterity the burthen which we ourselves ought to bear. The execution of these maxims belongs to your Representatives; but it is necessary that public opinion should cooperate. To facilitate to them the performance of their duty it is essential that you should practically bear in mind that toward the payment of debts there must be revenue; that to have revenue there must be taxes; that no taxes can be devised which are not more or less inconvenient and unpleasant; that the intrinsic embarrassment inseparable from the selection of the proper objects (which is always a choice of difficulties) ought to be a decisive motive for a candid construction of the conduct of the government in making it, and for a spirit of acquiescence in the measures for obtaining revenue which the public exigencies may at any time dictate.

Observe good faith and justice toward all nations. Cultivate peace and harmony with all. Religion and morality enjoin this conduct. And can it be that good policy does not equally enjoin it? It will be worthy of a free, enlightened, and at no distant period a great nation to give to mankind the magnanimous and too novel example of a people always guided by an exalted justice and benevolence. Who can doubt that in the course of time and things the fruits of such a plan would richly repay any temporary advantages which might be lost by a steady adherence to it? Can it be that Providence has not connected the permanent felicity of a nation with its virtue? The experiment, at least, is recommended by every sentiment which ennobles human nature. Alas! is it rendered impossible by its vices?

In the execution of such a plan nothing is more essential than that permanent, inveterate antipathies against particular nations and passionate attachments for others should be excluded, and that in place of them just and amicable feelings toward all should be cultivated. The nation which indulges toward another an habitual hatred or an habitual fondness is in some degree a slave. It is a slave to its animosity or to its affection, either of which is sufficient to lead it astray from its duty and its interest. Antipathy in one nation against another disposes each more readily to offer insult and injury, to lay hold of slight causes of umbrage, and to be haughty and intractable when accidental or trifling occasions of dispute occur.

Hence, frequent collisions, obstinate, envenomed, and bloody contests. The nation prompted by ill will and resentment sometimes impels to war the government contrary to the best calculations of policy. The government sometimes participates in the national propensity and adopts through passion what reason would reject. At other times it makes the animosity of the nation subservient to projects of hostility, instigated by pride, ambition, and other sinister and pernicious motives. The peace often, sometimes perhaps the liberty, of nations has been the victim.

So, likewise, a passionate attachment of one nation for another produces a variety of evils. Sympathy for the favorite nation, facilitating the illusion of an imaginary common interest in cases where no real common interest exists and infusing into one the enmities of the other, betrays the former into a participation in the quarrels and wars of the latter without adequate inducement or justification. It leads also to concessions to the favorite nation of privileges denied to others, which is apt doubly to injure the nation making the concessions by unnecessarily parting with what ought to have been retained and by exciting jealousy, ill will, and a disposition to retaliate in the parties from whom equal privileges are withheld; and it gives to ambitious, corrupted, or deluded citizens (who devote themselves to the favorite nation) facility to betray or sacrifice the interests of their own country without odium, sometimes even with popularity, gilding with the appearances of a virtuous sense of obligation a commendable deference for public opinion or a laudable zeal for public good the base or foolish compliances of ambition, corruption, or infatuation.

As avenues to foreign influence in innumerable ways, such attachments are particularly alarming to the truly enlightened and independent patriot. How many opportunities do they afford to tamper with domestic factions, to practice the arts of seduction, to mislead public opinion, to influence or awe the public councils! Such an attachment of a small or weak toward a great and powerful nation dooms the former to be the satellite of the latter. Against the insidious wiles of foreign influence—I conjure you to believe me, fellow citizens—the jealousy of a free people ought to be constantly awake, since history and experience prove that foreign influence is one of the most baneful foes of republican government. But that jealousy, to be useful, must be impartial, else it becomes the instrument of the very influence to be avoided, instead of a defense against it. Excessive partiality for one foreign nation and excessive dislike of another cause those whom they actuate to see danger only on one side, and serve to veil and even second the arts of influence on the other. Real patriots who may resist the intrigues of the favorite are liable to become suspected and odious, while its tools and dupes usurp the applause and confidence of the people to surrender their interests.

The great rule of conduct for us in regard to foreign nations is, in extending our commercial relations, to have with them as little political connection as possible. So far as we have already formed engagements, let them be fulfilled with perfect good faith. Here let us stop.

Europe has a set of primary interests which to us have none or a very remote relation. Hence she must be engaged in frequent controversies, the causes of which are essentially foreign to our concerns. Hence, therefore, it must be unwise in us to implicate ourselves by artificial ties in the ordinary vicissitudes of her politics or the ordinary combinations and collisions of her friendships or enmities.

Our detached and distant situation invites and enables us to pursue a different course. If we remain one people, under an efficient government, the period is not far off when we may defy material injury from external annoyance; when we may take such an attitude as will cause the neutrality we may at any time resolve upon to be scrupulously respected; when belligerent nations, under the impossibility of making acquisitions upon us, will not lightly hazard the giving us provocation; when we may choose peace or war, as our interest, guided by justice, shall counsel.

Why forego the advantages of so peculiar a situation? Why quit our own to stand upon foreign ground? Why, by interweaving our destiny with that of any part of Europe, entangle our peace and prosperity in the toils of European ambition, rivalship, interest, humor, or caprice?

It is our true policy to steer clear of permanent alliances with any portion of the foreign world, so far, I mean, as we are now at liberty to do it; for let me not be understood as capable of patronizing infidelity to existing engagements. I hold the maxim no less applicable to public than to private affairs that honesty is always the best policy. I repeat, therefore, let those engagements be observed in their genuine sense. But in my opinion it is unnecessary and would be unwise to extend them.

Taking care always to keep ourselves by suitable establishments on a respectable defensive posture, we may safely trust to temporary alliances for extraordinary emergencies.

Harmony, liberal intercourse with all nations, are recommended by policy, humanity, and interest. But even our commercial policy should hold an equal and impartial hand, neither seeking nor granting exclusive favors or preferences; consulting the natural course of things; diffusing and diversifying by gentle means the streams of commerce, but forcing nothing; establishing with powers so disposed, in order to give trade a stable course, to define the rights of our merchants, and to enable the Government to support them, conventional rules of intercourse, the best that present circumstances and mutual opinion will permit, but temporary and liable to be from time to time abandoned or varied as experience and circumstances shall dictate; constantly keeping in view that it is folly in one nation to look for disinterested favors from another; that it must pay with a portion of its independence for whatever it may accept under that character; that by such acceptance it may place itself in the condition of having given equivalents for nominal favors, and yet of being reproached with ingratitude for not giving more. There can be no greater error than to expect or calculate upon real favors from nation to nation. It is an illusion which experience must cure, which a just pride ought to discard.

In offering to you, my countrymen, these counsels of an old and affectionate friend I dare not hope they will make the strong and lasting impression I could wish—that they will control the usual current of the passions or prevent our Nation from running the course which has hitherto marked the destiny of nations. But if I may even flatter myself that they may be productive of some partial benefit, some occasional good—that they may now and then recur to moderate the fury of party spirit, to warn against the mischiefs of foreign intrigue, to guard against the impostures of pretended patriotism—this hope will be a full recompense for the solicitude for your welfare by which they have been dictated.

How far in the discharge of my official duties I have been guided by the principles which have been delineated the public records and other evidences of my conduct must witness to you and to the world. To myself, the assurance of my own conscience is that I have at least believed myself to be guided by them.

In relation to the still subsisting war in Europe my proclamation of the 22d of April, 1793, is the index to my plan. Sanctioned by your approving voice, and by that of your representatives in both Houses of Congress, the spirit of that measure has continually governed me, uninfluenced by any attempts to deter or divert me from it.

After deliberate examination, with the aid of the best lights I could obtain, I was well satisfied that our country, under all the circumstances of the case, had a right to take, and was bound in duty and interest to take, a neutral position. Having taken it, I determined as far as should depend upon me to maintain it with moderation, preseverance, and firmness.

The considerations which respect the right to hold this conduct it is not necessary on this occasion to detail. I will only observe that, according to my understanding of the matter, that right, so far from being denied by any of the belligerent powers, has been virtually admitted by all.

The duty of holding a neutral conduct may be inferred, without anything more, from the obligation which justice and humanity impose on every nation, in cases in which it is free to act, to maintain inviolate the relations of peace and amity toward other nations.

The inducements of interest for observing that conduct will best be referred to your own reflections and experience. With me a predominant motive has been to endeavor to gain time to our country to settle and mature its yet recent institutions, and to progress without interruption to that degree of strength and consistency which is necessary to give it, humanly speaking, the command of its own fortunes.

Though in reviewing the incidents of my administration I am unconscious of intentional error, I am nevertheless too sensible of my defects not to think it probable that I may have committed many errors. Whatever they may be, I fervently beseech the Almighty to avert or mitigate the evils to which they may tend. I shall also carry with me the hope that my country will never cease to view them with indulgence, and that, after 45 years of my life dedicated to its service with an upright zeal, the faults of incompetent abilities will be consigned to oblivion, as myself must soon be to the mansions of rest.

Relying on its kindness in this as in other things, and actuated by that fervent love toward it which is so natural to a man who views in it the native soil of himself and his progenitors for several generations. I anticipate with pleasing expectation that retreat in which I promise myself to realize without alloy the sweet enjoyment of partaking in the midst of my fellow-citizens the benign influence of good laws under a free government—the ever-favorite object of my heart, and the happy reward, as I trust, of our mutual cares, labors, and dangers.

GO: WASHINGTON.

UNITED STATES, September 17, 1796.

[Applause.]

SWEARING IN OF A MEMBER.

Mr. HEFLIN, Mr. DUPRÉ, and Mr. BURNETT rose.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT]

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Speaker, my colleague, Mr. GRAY, from the first Alabama district, has arrived and desires to be sworn in. [Applause.]

Mr. OSCAR L. GRAY, a Representative from the State of Alabama, appeared before the bar of the House and took the oath of office.

COLLECTION OF STATISTICS OF COTTON.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of a very important resolution (H. J. Res. No. 103). This resolution was unanimously reported by the Committee on the Census, and pertains to the collection of statistics of cotton used in the manufacture of gunpowder and explosive shells. I ask unanimous consent that it be considered at this time, and I do not think that there will be any opposition to it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution named. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, this is in no sense an emergency matter, and I do not think it is a good resolution at all.

Mr. HEFLIN. I want to say, Mr. Speaker, that the last ginners' report will be announced on the 1st of March. The ginning season will be over, and it is important to have this information as soon as possible. We know now how much cotton is consumed by the spinners, and the department has authority to collect those statistics, and has collected them, but the department has no authority to collect these statistics, as was stated in the hearings before the committee. The chief statistician, Mr. Steuart, I will state, says that he is sure that more than a million bales of cotton has been consumed for this purpose in 12 months prior to January 1, 1916, but that he had no authority to go into these establishments and get this information. He has authority to collect statistics of raw cotton consumed by the spinners, but he has no authority to collect cotton partially prepared by other establishments and used at powdermills.

The statistics here sought are in great demand. Mr. Steuart stated that he had received thousands of letters from people all over the country asking how much cotton was being consumed for this purpose. It is very important to the producers to know this and it is important for the public to know it. And I will say to the gentleman from Illinois that it is proper that the Government should know how much cotton goes into the manufacture of powder and explosive shells, because when we go to put our preparedness program through we ought to know, and these statistics would tell us how much cotton would be required to manufacture a certain amount of powder and shells.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, if these gentlemen interested in such matters had been diligent a bill could have been introduced and brought before the House in the regular way a long time ago. This is not a proper way to consider such measures—to call them up without notice; passing them without consideration—and it is not an emergency matter. We have a Unanimous Consent Calendar and a Suspension Calendar, and I am forced to object.

Mr. HEFLIN. I will state to the gentleman that I have urged consideration of my resolution by the committee, and it was just reported two or three days ago. This is the first chance I have had to call it up.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects.

Mr. HEFLIN. I will state to the gentleman that the committee just reported the bill a moment ago.

The SPEAKER. The objection ends it.

Mr. MANN. The committee was not diligent, then.

INCOME-TAX LAW.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have read from the Clerk's desk certain correspondence between the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HULL] and myself regarding the income-tax law. The reading of this correspondence will consume about three minutes.

Mr. COX. Reserving the right to object, is three minutes all the time the gentleman from Louisiana will want?

Mr. MANN. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] is recognized.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman can get in under general debate.

POST OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the Post Office appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 10484) making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, and for other purposes, with Mr. RAINEY in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For temporary and auxiliary clerk hire at first and second class post offices and temporary and auxiliary clerk hire at summer and winter resort post offices, $1,800,000: Provided, That when the needs of the Postal Service require the employment on holidays of clerks in first and second class post offices and letter carriers in the City Delivery Service, the employees who are required and ordered to perform holiday work shall be allowed compensatory time on one of the 30 days following the holiday on which they perform such service: Provided, That for the purpose of this act holidays shall be all National, State, and local holidays that are observed by other branches of the Federal Government.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on that.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order to the language on the bottom of the page, to the proviso beginning in line 23, which reads:

That for the purpose of this act they shall be all National, State, and local holidays that are observed by other branches of the Federal Government.

That is new legislation.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order on the paragraph.

Mr. SISSON. I make a point of order on that language.

The CHAIRMAN. On the proviso?

Mr. SISSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman understands very well if he makes the point of order on that and it is sustained, and the rest is admitted, it makes it necessary to offer an amendment to the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that the gentleman from Mississippi makes the point of order on the proviso and the gentleman from Illinois reserves the point of order on the entire paragraph.

Mr. MANN. I withdraw by reservation of the point of order.

Mr. SISSON. I make the point of order.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, there is no question about the point of order being well taken.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

INCOME-TAX LAW.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I offer the pro forma amendment in order to have read from the Clerk's desk the matter which I just now tried to have read by unanimous consent.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

FEBRUARY 18, 1916.

Hon. CORDELL HULL,
House of Representatives, City.

MY DEAR SIR: Certain newspapers, whether in ignorance of the provisions of the present income-tax law or from a desire to discredit it with the country, continue to assert from time to time that Congress in framing that statute exempted its own membership from the operation of the law, exempted likewise Federal officials, and failed entirely to subject thereto the salaries of State, county, or municipal officials.

With a view of clarifying the matter, I respectfully ask leave to propound to you some questions relative to these assertions, which I shall thank you to answer as categorically as possible. I, of course, am familiar with the income-tax law and anticipate the nature of your reply to these queries, but an authorized statement from you, who are generally regarded as the author of the income-tax features of the Underwood tariff law and whose deep study of and wide familiarity with the subject are generally admitted, will carry much more weight and conclusiveness than would attach to any utterance of mine and may accordingly serve to put an end to these repeated misstatements of fact and of law. Hence this letter.

The questions I desire to submit to you follow:

1. Are Members of the Senate and the House of Representatives in the Congress of the United States required to pay an income tax? Do they enjoy any immunity not accorded others having similar income?

2. Are Federal officials, whose salaries exceed the exemption limit given to all citizens, subject to the provisions of the income-tax law? What exemptions, if any, are there in this respect? Why, if such exemption is granted to the present President of the United States during the term for which he was elected, and those members of the Supreme and inferior courts of the United States who were on the bench at the time the Underwood tariff bill became a law, was such exemption provided for?

3. If the compensation of officials of a State, or any of its political subdivisions, was exempted from the income-tax law, "except when such compensation is paid by the United States Government," why was this done? Was this last clause —"except when such compensation is paid by the United States Government"—inserted especially to meet the case of United States Senators and Representatives, as to whose status, viz, whether they are Federal or State officials, there has been much discussion, a question which, by the way, was recently before the Supreme Court of the United States but was not decided by that tribunal. (See Lamar v. United States.)

I respectfully ask permission to make public this letter and your reply thereto.

With expressions of personal regard, I am,

Sincerely, yours,

H. GARLAND DUPRÉ.

COMMITTEE ON WAYS AND MEANS,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., February 19, 1916.

Hon. H. GARLAND DUPRÉ,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR SIR: I am in receipt of your letter of the 18th instant in which you propound certain questions relative to some of the provisions of the present Federal income-tax law.

I take pleasure in answering these questions as best I can. I am satisfied that you nor any other person who has read the law would ask these questions for personal information.

Replying to question 1, I would say that under the plain letter of the law Members of the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States are required to pay income tax upon their respective salaries and all other net income accruing to them from every source, less the statutory exemptions of $3,000 and $4,000 allowed to single and married persons, respectively. Senators and Members of the House of Representatives, of course, do not under the law secure the benefit of any deduction, exemption, or immunity of any kind not accorded to all other income-tax payers. So far as I know or have heard there was never a suggestion, an idea, or even a thought of so wording the law as to allow Representatives and Senators the slightest immunity or advantage over other individual taxpayers.

Replying to your second question, I would say that all Federal officials whose salaries exceed the exemption limits prescribed for the benefit of all citizens are subject to the provisions of the income-tax law, with this qualification, viz, "The compensation of the present President of the United States during the term for which he was elected and the judges of the Supreme Court and inferior courts of the United States now in office."

The reason for these temporary exemptions was obvious. The constitutional provision to the effect that the compensation received by the President for his services shall neither be increased nor diminished during the period for which he shall have been elected, and the further constitutional provision to the effect that judges, both of the Supreme and inferior courts, shall receive for their services a compensation which shall not be diminished during their continuance in office, as construed under the operation of former income-tax laws, are solely responsible for the temporary exemptions to which I have referred.

Chief Justice Taney, on February 16, 1863, filed with the Secretary of the Treasury an elaborate opinion, holding that an act of Congress retaining in the Treasury a portion of the compensation of Federal judges in office at the time of the enactment of the law was unconstitutional and void. This opinion was entered on the records of the United States Supreme Court by order of the Supreme Court itself.

On October 23, 1869, the Attorney General of the United States, Hon. E. R. Hoar, furnished an official opinion to the Secretary of the Treasury to the effect that the income-tax law did not "require or permit any deduction of an income tax from the salaries of the President or the justices of the Supreme Court." The law was administered accordingly.

It may be here remarked that the present law goes further in this respect than former income-tax laws, in that the present law expressly provides that the compensation of the successors of the President of the United States and of the judges of the Supreme and inferior courts in office at the time of its passage shall be taxed.

In reply to your third question, I would say that the compensation of all officers or employees of a State or any political subdivision thereof are exempt from the income tax under the law. This exemption is in compliance with a long line of United States Supreme Court decisions, holding that the Federal Government can not tax the instrumentalities of a State, and that a State can not tax the agencies or instrumentalities of the Federal Government. One of the leading cases directly in point is United States v. Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co. (17 Wal., 322.)

Any provision in the present income-tax law imposing a tax on the salaries of State and county officials would have been void and of no effect.

I may here remark that the provision exempting the compensation of State and local officials in accordance with Supreme Court decisions and former practices of the Federal Government contained the added exception that when such compensation is paid by the United States Government no exemption lies. This clause was intended completely to foreclose any remote suspicion of an intention to exempt the compensation of United States Senators and Representatives in Congress.

You are at liberty to publish this letter.

Very truly,

CORDELL HULL.

During the reading of the foregoing, the following colloquy occurred:

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the Clerk conclude the reading of the letter.

Mr. MOON. Why not put it in the RECORD?

Mr. DUPRÉ. I am afraid that the gentleman from Tennessee or other gentlemen may not read the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Louisiana asks unanimous consent that the Clerk conclude the reading of the letter.

Mr. MOON. How long will it take?

Mr. DUPRÉ. About a minute.

Mr. MOON. All right.

The Clerk concluded the reading of the correspondence.

POST OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For pay of letter carriers at offices already established, including substitutes for letter carriers absent without pay, and for the promotion of 75 per cent of the letter carriers in first-class post offices from the fifth to the sixth grade and for the promotion of 75 per cent of the letter carriers in second-class offices from the fourth to the fifth grade, City Delivery Service, $39,100,000: Provided, That hereafter there shall be no distinction in salary made between letter carriers assigned to collection duty and letter carriers assigned to delivery duty: And provided further, That letter carriers whose salaries have been reduced as the result of any order of the Post Office Department, making the maximum salary $1,000 to be paid letter carriers assigned to collection duty, shall be restored to their former grades.

For pay of substitutes for letter carriers absent with pay, and of auxiliary and temporary letter carriers at offices where city delivery is already established, $3,675,000.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order on the proviso beginning in line 7 and ending at the end of line 14.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have the gentleman reserve that point of order, if he pleases, long enough to get an explanation of it.

Mr. SISSON. I will reserve the point of order, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. On both provisos?

Mr. SISSON. Yes; on both provisos.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, the classification law of 1907 provided that carriers and clerks be promoted automatically from one grade to another each year, and that the maximum salary paid to clerks and carriers should be $1,200. During the last year the Post Office authorities so construed the classification law as to set the meaning of the law aside. They decided that a carrier and a collector were two different employments, whereas the law itself makes no distinction whatever between a carrier and a collector, because collectors and carriers are letter carriers. One man delivers letters; the other man collects them, but each man carries the letters. And the result of the distinction made by the department was that a great many letter carriers, throughout the United States were, during the past year, reduced from $1,200 to $1,000, and the statement was made by the authorities that this reduction was made because of the fact that the carriers were doing two distinct characters of work. But the law never contemplated that. And the exercise of discretion placed in the department was so used during the last year as to do a great injustice to men who had earned promotion from $800, the entrance salary, to $1,200, the maximum salary.

The system of efficiency adopted by the department and used throughout the country provides that men shall be rated according to the regularity with which they attend to their business, the efficiency with which they perform their work, the number of letters which they are able to throw within a given time, and a number of other conditions. And under this efficiency policy most of the men who were reduced, if not all, during the last year, from $1,200 to $1,000, had during all the period of their service in the Post Office Department earned a record of about 95 per cent out of a possible 100 per cent of efficiency. After they had earned this record of efficiency, and it had been given to them, they found themselves coming in from work, say at 6 o'clock at night, with no cloud anywhere upon the sky; with a clear record which they had earned by their efficiency, with a rating of 95 per cent out of a possible 100, and with a feeling of security that they had done their work well. They came back to work next morning and they found their records changed from 95 to 58. Now, why 58? Because under the rules of the department if a man's efficiency record reaches 58 by reason of demerits, or for any other cause, he is subject to a reduction in his salary.

But the presumption is that before his efficiency record can be lowered there must be some reason for lowering it, and that reason must presumably be because he has failed to perform his duty, has proven himself inefficient; that he has been negligent; that he has not delivered the letters that were placed in his charge; that he has taken too long to go over his route; that he has become disqualified to act in the grade in which he has been serving.

But there is no such charge made against the men whose records were lowered from 95 to 58; no charge whatever. They were arbitrarily reduced from 95 to 58 to bring them below the point where they could continue to draw the salary which they had earned by long years of efficient service. And when I tell you, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of this committee, that this is a grave injustice to the men who have given the best years of their lives to the service of the Government, I simply say what everybody in the United States realizes. It can not be justified by any sort of argument or by any plan of economy that may be necessary to put into execution.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. MADDEN. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. I do.

Mr. CANNON. Who made this order?

Mr. MADDEN. The Postmaster General, or the First Assistant Postmaster General, who has direct jurisdiction.

Mr. CANNON. Over the Postmaster General?

Mr. MADDEN. Oh, he has no direct jurisdiction over the Postmaster General, but he has jurisdiction over the men. All the orders are issued or made by the Postmaster General.

Mr. CANNON. One other question.

Mr. MADDEN. Certainly.

Mr. CANNON. How many of these clerks were there?

Mr. MADDEN. They were carriers.

Mr. CANNON. How many carriers were reduced?

Mr. MADDEN. There were 215 of them reduced in Chicago, and I think something like 1,300 throughout the country.

Mr. CANNON. Now, the gentleman having studied the law, can these carriers bring action in the Court of Claims or in Federal courts to recover the $200 that was cut off?

Mr. MADDEN. I think they could but for this fact: In order to compel these men to submit to a reduction from $1,200 to $1,000 a year, they were required to sign a form letter, in which they set forth the fact that they recognized that the $1,200 was paid to the men because they were of a high grade of efficiency, and that they were no longer of that grade of efficiency that would justify their continuance in the grade, and that they asked to be reduced to $1,000 in order that they might be permitted to remain in the service, on condition, however, that opportunity would be afforded them later, if they could prove themselves worthy, for reinstatement to the higher grade.

These letters were prepared for the men. They were all of the same type. Every letter was of a form prepared by the local postmaster under whom these men were employed.

Mr. CANNON. Did any of them refuse, if the gentleman will allow me, to sign such statements?

Mr. MADDEN. Why, it would be perfectly absurd for the man who was dependent on the salary he was receiving to refuse, when he knew that refusal would separate him from the service; and his only recourse was, in order that he might be able to earn something to maintain his dependent family, to sign the letter which they required him to sign.

Mr. CANNON. Then the gentleman's contention is that the order was in violation of the law?

Mr. MADDEN. Absolutely.

Mr. CANNON. And that the letters were signed under duress?

Mr. MADDEN. There is no question whatever about that.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. I will.

Mr. SLOAN. Will the gentleman state what excuse or extenuation or justification the department submits for this rather high-handed proceeding?

Mr. MADDEN. Well, the first excuse is that they did not consider a letter carrier who collects letters as performing as high a grade of duty as the man who is a letter carrier and delivers letters. The First Assistant Postmaster General, in his statement before the Committee of the House during the consideration of this bill, stated that a blind man could collect letters; that he did not require any brains.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE. Were these reductions made solely in the class of men who did the collecting, or were the men who delivered letters also included?

Mr. MADDEN. The men were reduced from the position of carriers to the position of collectors, and their salaries were reduced from $1,200 to $1,000 because of the change of duty.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. MADDEN. I do.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Does the classification act of 1907 make any such distinction?

Mr. MADDEN. Absolutely none; and I stated that in the opening of my remarks.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. ALLEN. Was there not a provision in the joint resolution passed at the close of the last Congress, continuing the 1915 Post Office appropriations on account of the failure of the Post Office appropriation bill to pass—was there not a clause in the joint resolution providing that there should be no demotions of these men, or distinctions in those classes?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes. That was very distinctly set forth in the joint resolution. Instructions were given to the officers of the department, the Postmaster General and his assistants, in the joint resolution adopted by the last Congress continuing the 1915 appropriation, that no man should be reduced in compensation, and that all the men who had been reduced should be restored.

Now, in the face of the interpretation given the law by the Postmaster General and his assistants, the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads saw nothing else whatever to do except to construe the law for them, and to reiterate what the law already says, that a letter carrier is a letter carrier, whether he collects or delivers mail. [Applause.] That is all that this does, and if those men have been reduced in compensation without lightening the burdens of their work, and the law has been violated by the Postmaster General, there is nothing on earth left for this body to do except to tell the Postmaster General what the law is and give him the direction which we have the right and the authority to give, to restore the men who have been unjustly reduced from the positions which they had earned by their efficiency to a position $200 less in grade.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. SLOAN. I understand the gentleman to say that this reduction of grade from 95 per cent to 58 per cent was purely arbitrary?

Mr. MADDEN. Oh, absolutely; because it was done over night, without cause.

Mr. SLOAN. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. SLOAN. Before that reduction was made on the books were any of these men that were affected by it called in and given any opportunity to show cause why it should not be done?

Mr. MADDEN. There is a perfunctory letter, signed by the postmaster who ordered the reduction, to the First Assistant Postmaster General stating that he has for certain reasons authorized a reduction in the compensation of the men, and he also states that he gives the man five days in which to state his side of the case. But when a man comes to state his side of the case what happens? They present him with this form letter and say, "You do not have to sign this." But if he did not sign it he knew what would follow. And so he signed it, and went on his way rejoicing to tell his wife and his children how fortunate he was in having been reduced only $200 a year, after giving 20 years of efficient service, instead of being discharged for having committed no offense.

So that the time has come when even the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON] ought to open the windows of his heart and let the sunshine in. I say to him, Open the windows of your heart and let the sunshine in; do not be a pessimist; be liberal enough to do justice; do not be like a blind man going into a dark room looking for a black hat that he knew was never there. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, it was not intended that I should provoke much discussion in this matter; but I want to say to my friend from Illinois that my soul has always been open and I have always let the sunshine in; but in doing that the light comes in, and men see by the light, and so it is unnecessary to make an argument in answer to the statement made by the gentleman from Illinois that there is any obligation on the part of the Federal Government to take care of anybody. We ought to pay the employees of the Government reasonable and fair salaries for the services which they render the Federal Government, and I am rather getting tired of hearing men speak of holding positions in the Federal Government as if they had some vested title or some vested right to a position in the Government. There is no such thing as a vested right to an office or place. Now, as I understand the facts in this case, I understand the record will show that some of the carriers were not capable of performing the duties of delivering mail efficiently and rapidly to the people to whom the letters were directed, and instead of the department discharging them from the service it mercifully put them on this less important and lighter work and permitted them to remain in the service, setting them to gathering the mail, which is not as important as its distribution and delivery, because the mail, being placed in the boxes, it is only necessary for them to gather it up and put it into the receptacle or sack and take it to the post office, where it is distributed by others. The Post Office Department was endeavoring not only to practice some economy in the interest of efficient service, but instead of discharging these men who were inefficient to perform the higher and more arduous duties it mercifully made a division of the work and retained those men, at a thousand dollars a year, and I understand the gentleman to admit that it was optional with the men to take that reduction. In every department of this Government as men have grown inefficient by reason of age they have been reduced in salary and given lighter work. What we need in the civil service, if we need it at all, is a system under which men are advanced and rewarded for efficient, patient, and effective work and not for inefficiency.

Mr. Chairman, I sympathize with the man in the field and in the mine who may be unfortunate. He belongs to a forgotten class. He is the man whom nobody talks about here. You never hear any voice raised on this floor in his behalf, although he is the man who pays the bill. He is only important at election time—why not now? When the man in the little blacksmith shop back in the country, or the man working in the small shop in the great city is unfortunate, he is either an object of charity or he must live on what he has saved. But here we find men continually crying out that the Federal Government owes a man something beside a fair compensation because he is connected with the Federal service. All that it owes any man is a fair compensation. These positions are fought for. Men come and worry Congressmen to get the places. They worry the lives out of Representatives and Senators, and then after they get their names on the pay roll, they worry the life out of you for shorter hours and more pay. I would like to see one of these men who is thoroughly satisfied and thoroughly efficient. There is something wrong with the system somewhere, somehow. Either the rewards do not come quickly enough, or they do not deserve the rewards. But in this particular case you take away from the Postmaster General and the executive department the right which the manager of every business has; and if the Postmaster General is the right sort of a man, he ought to be given some discretion in these matters. You can not enforce your civil-service law, as it is written, without it.

I make the point of order, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. MOON. Will the gentleman withhold the point of order a moment?

Mr. SISSON. I reserve the point of order for a moment.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I want to say that the point of order is well taken, if insisted upon. This is among the other new matters in this bill which are specifically pointed out in the rule that has been introduced and which we will ask for the consideration of at the close of the bill. Of course, I do not desire to take any time on the point of order. It is conceded.

I am, however, in sympathy with this new legislation proposed and advocated very ably by my friend from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN]. But there is not as much in this contention as might be thought at first. There are only a few persons who have been reduced by this order. Yet, as far as I am concerned, I am willing to see those few restored under the law. I have here a communication from the First Assistant Postmaster General on this subject, which reads as follows:

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
FIRST ASSISTANT POSTMASTER GENERAL,
Washington, February 21, 1916.

Hon. JOHN A. MOON,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR JUDGE MOON: Referring to the discussions in the House in relation to the Post Office appropriation bill now under consideration, it has been noted that various Members are stating in open debate that the reduction of letter carriers assigned to collection duty is an attempt on the part of the department to reduce old men who have spent years in the service to a lower grade of salary simply because of the fact that they have become in a measure less efficient by reason of their long-continued service with the Post Office Department.

As stated before the Post Office Committee when the hearings were in progress, this is not a true condition. As a matter of fact, carriers over 60 years of age are now receiving an annual average salary of $1,163.94. Carriers under 60 years of age are receiving an annual average salary of $1,126. Only a small proportion of the men now employed as letter carriers and who are over 60 years of age have been reduced in salary because of the changes made in relation to placing the maximum compensation for collection service at $1,000 per annum.

I am submitting herewith a list of every letter carrier in the United States of the age of 60 years or more, the list showing the office at which these carriers are employed, their ages, salaries, years in the service, and the character of work which they perform. This table in itself clearly refutes the statement that collectors are generally old men, and that the reductions made affect these old men in the service.

From this table I beg leave to call your attention to the following figures in relation to the service of the men over 60 years of age in several of the larger cities:

[1] 6 of these 69 employees route mail for delivery and do not make actual deliveries

In justice to the department, under the circumstances, I trust you will find it convenient to insert this letter and the attached table in the RECORD.

Very truly, yours,

DANIEL C. ROPER,
First Assistant Postmaster General.

From this letter it appears that as a matter of fact carriers over 60 years of age are now receiving an annual average salary of $1,163.94, and carriers under 60 years of age are receiving an annual salary of $1,126. It also appears that only a small portion of the men employed as letter carriers who are over 60 years of age have been reduced in salary because of the changes made in relation to placing the maximum compensation for collection service at $1,000 per annum.

With this letter from the First Assistant Postmaster General comes a statement giving the letter carriers by grades who are over 60 years of age. It shows of the $800 grade, 5; of the $900 grade, 3; of the $1,000 grade, 161; of the $1,100 grade, 99; of the $1,200 grade, 980; total number of carriers over 60 years of age, 1,248; average annual salary of carriers aged 60 and over on January 1, 1916, $1,163.94; average salary of carriers less than 60 years of age on the same date, $1,126; average annual salary of all carriers in the service on the same date, $1,127.45.

I ask unanimous consent to insert this statement in the RECORD in connection with my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to insert the statement in his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MOON. So it will be seen that under no condition has there been very much reduction in these salaries, and it is possible that for their proper adjustment no other arrangement could have been made than that which has been made. But in view of the fact that there are a few—though very few—who may suffer from this arrangement, which is possibly the best the department could make, I have given my consent to this amendment; and I advise my good friend from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON], who sits here with the rule in his hand, which points out all of the legislation which is out of order, that we are going to make a strenuous effort to have this proposition included in the rule, unless his wisdom and judgment, so much superior to that of everybody connected with the Post Office Committee, should prevail.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Mr. Chairman, in this connection I desire to say that I rather sympathize with the proposition of my good friend from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], who is usually right, and one of the best Members on the floor of the House; but I have not heard his voice raised in behalf of the rural carriers. He claims that injustice has been done to a certain class of city carriers. I desire to call his attention to the manner in which the civil service has eliminated rural carriers where automobile service has been installed.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TRIBBLE. Certainly.

Mr. MADDEN. I want to say that I am in thorough sympathy with the rural-carrier proposition as outlined by the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. TRIBBLE. I am glad to hear the gentleman say that. The salary of certain city carriers has been reduced by this bill, and the gentleman fights gallantly for restoration of salary. The rural carrier has been removed from the service entirely where the automobile has supplanted the horse, unless the carrier again takes a civil-service examination. I know of no other employee of the Government now serving under civil service required to be reexamined to hold his position, and I contend the civil service has discriminated against the rural carrier by requiring this examination.

Mr. MOON. If the gentleman will pardon me, I would like to have this go along in an orderly way, and would not the gentleman be willing to wait until we get to the provision for rural carriers and then perhaps we can have the time for debate extended?

Mr. TRIBBLE. This question is before the House, and I am not going to take up much time, and I desire to call attention to the fact that these men in the Rural Service have been for years and years on the routes, and the Civil Service Commission requires a new examination for automobile service over the same territory where the old carrier has served faithfully and well; and I say a reexamination to deliver mail in the same boxes, to the same patrons, and on the same roads is contrary to the fundamental principles of civil service. The old carrier knows every person on the route, he knows the names of the children who run to meet him day by day. Even the farm dog greets the carrier with a friendly wag of his tail, and I can not understand why he should be subjected to an examination to continue work he knows so well.

Mr. MOON. The civil-service law requires what shall be done, and we could not change that here.

Mr. TRIBBLE. My complaint is against the civil service. I am not criticizing the Post Office Department. The civil-service laws should be amended. I contend that the civil service has too much authority to adopt regulations. This Congress should legislate, and if you will insert the following language in this bill the civil service will recognize it as direction from this House. The following is my bill and amendment to this bill:

Carriers of rural mail now serving as carriers under civil service shall be eligible for appointment as carriers of rural mail on any kind of automobile route that may be established without standing civil-service examination, and upon recommendation of the Representative in Congress of the district where the office is located from which the route operates the carrier now in service shall be appointed to new mail automobile route covering the territory of the carrier now in service. Such rural mail carrier shall not be rejected as carrier for automobile route unless so recommended by the Representative in Congress from the district where the office is located serving the route.

Mr. Chairman, the Civil Service Commission is clothed with too much authority. Members of Congress should have the authority to reject undesirable persons making eligible mark for positions in their respective districts, instead of a Civil Service Commission located in Washington. I am trying to amend the civil-service regulations in this regard. If there are undesirable persons, objectionable to the community to be served, on the eligible list by examination, then let the Member of Congress prevent the appointment and not let the commission in Washington force such person on the community against the best interest of the community. I trust the friends of civil service will join me in making this much-needed amendment. Such an amendment would render more popular the Civil Service Commission in the South and prevent the appointment of persons very objectionable to the people by this civil-service board in Washington.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, so far as this item is concerned I do not care so much about it, because there is not much involved in it. But I can not refrain from replying to some extent to the argument made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN]. He undertakes to criticize the Postmaster General, and if I remember his argument correctly, intimating that the Postmaster General is doing things here unlawfully; that he had no power and no authority to do the things which he has been doing.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have not had the time, and I have not now the time, to digest the classification act of 1907, but I think the classification act of 1907 gave the Postmaster General the power to do the things that he undertook to do here. In other words, I think he had the law to do it.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COX. I can not now.

Mr. TRIBBLE. I only wanted to say that I made no charge against the Postmaster General but the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. COX. I am not saying that the gentleman did. I am calling the gentleman's attention to section 3 of the act of July 16, 1914, which provides "that the appropriation herein made for officers, clerks, and other persons employed in the public service shall not be available for compensation to any person incapacitated otherwise than temporarily for the performance of such service."

Now the Postmaster General under that authority had a perfect right to determine whether or not these men engaged in the collection and distribution service were incapacitated for performing their work. The argument is unfair that the Postmaster General did what he did do arbitrarily, without any authority of law, and in open violation of law.

Let us see what the facts are. Gen. Roper testified before the committee as follows:

Mr. ROPER. There were 1,292 carriers receiving $1,100 and $1,200 and doing collection work February 4, 1915. Since that time 698 of these men have been assigned to distribution and delivery work where they are entitled to the maximum salary.

Then that disposes of 698 of the 1,292, disposed of at a maximum salary. Then he goes on:

Then 268 others remained as collectors at their own request and accepted smaller salaries. Of the remainder, 275, after due tests on delivery routes—that is, the postmasters were asked to permit them to demonstrate whether they could do that work—were found to be incapable of performing distribution and delivery work, and consequently were reduced because of that inefficiency to the $1,000 grade.

A strenuous argument has been made this morning that these men were coerced into signing a written agreement in which they agree to accept a less salary. I want to say, Mr. Chairman, that that statement is ex parte of the record. I do not know a word in the record in this case that either Postmaster General Burleson or Gen. Roper or any postmaster in the United States ever coerced or undertook to coerce a single one of these employees, compelling him to accept less than the maximum salary. There is not a word in the record about it.

Mr. Chairman, these 275 were reduced directly under the authority given to the Postmaster General under section 3 of the act of 1914. I wonder if the time has come when a great administrative officer of our Government shall be criticized and criticized severely on the floor of this House because he undertakes to improve the efficiency of the service. I do not care whether he improves it at the expense of economy or not, but certainly the time has come when some man ought to rise on the floor and defend a man charged with the administration of our great Government when he tries to bring about efficiency. But to refer again to these 275 men about which complaint is made, the record in this case shows that the postmasters in the various cities of this country after due test found that they were incompetent to do their work.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, proceeding just a little bit further to read from the record of this case, Gen. Roper says:

In carrying out the Postmaster General's direction we found that of the total force of carriers (approximately 33,000), 1,292, who were receiving $1,100 or $1,200 a year, were engaged the greater part of their time in the simple work of collecting mail. We then directed the postmasters to assign these men to delivery work, and 698 of them were so assigned without any loss of salary. In this way 698 of the 1,292 assumed their proper duties and are now earning the maximum salaries. We were then told by the postmasters that of those remaining a number did not desire to undertake the higher-grade work, but preferred to continue on collection duty and receive less salary.

Why, a majority of these 275 men were mounted carriers, men engaged in collecting the mail, riding upon wagons. That is the truth about it—at least, if the record is true—and when you turn to read this record there is nothing you will find that bears out the argument that is made this morning against the Postmaster General. To repeat, I assert—and I assert it from the record of this case—that everything that the Postmaster General did in this matter he did under authority of law. He has done nothing unlawful, nothing illegal, but under the strong arm and the power of the law; and I rise here not so much because this little item is in dispute, so far as that is concerned, but to defend the Postmaster General against the unjust charge that he is, forsooth, undertaking to administer the great postal affairs of this country in open violation of law. It is not true.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, I listened to the First Assistant Postmaster General's statement at the hearings and to his defense of this procedure in regard to these carriers, and I do not wish by my silence to sanction the statement that this action was taken arbitrarily and without any rhyme or reason. It is putting it a little strong, it seems to me, because the First Assistant Postmaster General in the hearings quoted the language cited by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cox], that he was enforcing the law, to wit—that appropriations herein made for the officers, clerks, and persons employed in the public service shall not be available for compensation of any persons incapacitated from performing such service.

His theory is perfectly defensible—in fact, it is, to my mind, as reasonable a theory of what the law means as any that has been advanced—and while sympathizing with the effort to take care of these superannuated carriers, and while I am willing to vote for a rule making this legislation in order, I do not wish by my silence to say that the department has violated the law in taking the action that it has. I concur almost entirely with the views expressed by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cox] upon that point. I do not think the charge of arbitrary conduct and violation of law is sustained. On the contrary, it seems to me that it was an effort to increase the efficiency of the service. However, I believe that the law should be construed with mercy and consideration for those faithful employees, and I think that so construing it they might be left to remain in their positions and salaries.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained. It is clearly new legislation. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For pay of letter carriers, substitute and auxiliary letter carriers at offices where City Delivery Service is established during the year, $75,000: Provided, That substitute clerks in first and second class post offices, or substitute letter carriers in the City Delivery Service shall be paid at the rate of 35 cents an hour for vacation service, or for auxiliary service or for temporary service, or for temporary regular service, or temporary service of any other designation: Provided further, That substitute clerks in first and second class post offices or substitute letter carriers in the City Delivery Service when working in places of regular employees who are off duty without pay, shall be paid at the rate of 40 cents an hour.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order for the purpose of asking the chairman of the committee what is the reason for the difference in the compensation of some clerks at 35 cents an hour and other clerks at 40 cents an hour. One class of clerks receives apparently 35 cents an hour for vacation service and another 40 cents an hour. Why the distinction?

Mr. TAGUE. Mr. Chairman, the reason for the distinction is that those who receive the 40 cents an hour are merely substitutes who work a few days at a time. Those who receive 35 cents an hour are men who do a long service as substitutes in the department. For instance, they carry the whole vacation period, while the men who receive the 40 cents an hour work one hour or one day or an hour and a half and are paid approximately at that rate.

Mr. SISSON. Neither class of these people are permanent. They may or may not work at long intervals. I shall not make the point of order on the paragraph if I can get the committee to agree to compensate them at the same rate.

Mr. TAGUE. Mr. Chairman, the reason for the 40 cents an hour is that the men are compelled to report every morning in the year at 7 o'clock, whether they work or not, and they get paid for just the amount of service that they render. If they have one trip or one hour of work, they get paid at the rate of 40 cents an hour; but the men who are paid at 35 cents an hour get a full day's work or a full week's work or a full month's work. That is the reason for the difference.

Mr. SISSON. That is, the 35-cent men get a full week or a full month?

Mr. TAGUE. In many cases, yes. That is the way he is paid when he gets a full day's work or a full week's work—at the rate of 35 cents an hour. If he works for only an hour or an hour and a half or two hours he gets paid at the rate of 40 cents an hour.

Mr. SISSON. That might be what the gentleman intends, but it is not what this language says. This language says:

That substitute clerks in first and second class post offices or substitute letter carriers in the City Delivery Service—

And so forth.

When working in place of a regular employee. That is, when they take the place of a regular employee, and if that employee is off a month or two weeks on sick leave he gets 40 cents an hour, whereas the man who takes the place of another carrier would only get 35 cents an hour, and they both might work the same number of days under this bill.

Mr. TAGUE. This is for temporary regular service.

Mr. SISSON. I understand that. One may be temporary regular service and the other may be substitute carrier, but in effect it will result in the very condition of which I speak. Now, if this new law here should provide that where he works one hour or two hours or three hours or a week even, that he should get 40 cents an hour and the other 35 cents an hour, I would have no objection to that distinction, but your law does not read that way. That may be the intent and purpose, but you have one man working 30 days to take the place of a man who has taken his 30 days' leave of vacation and the other man comes in and takes the place of a substitute temporary regular carrier and he would get 35 cents and might work identically the same number of days. Now, if the amendment was so drawn that both of these men for the same service would get the same money, I would not have any objection to it, but your law does not read that way. I am willing to make the service for the substitute clerks, first and second class post office, 35 cents an hour and pay them like we do the others.

Mr. MADDEN. That is simply what we have been paying.

Mr. SISSON. But your law then makes a change.

Mr. MADDEN. The Postmaster General recommended a reduction of the item from 40 cents to 35 cents.

Mr. SISSON. My understanding of the reason for the reduction is this: You have two men working side by side. One man takes a certain place in the Post Office Department and works a week, 10 days, or 30 days. Alongside of him is a man who works about the same length of time and does the same service, and one is paid 35 cents an hour and the other 40 cents an hour which creates a dissatisfaction.

Mr. MADDEN. The truth of the matter is they ought all to be given 40 cents an hour and not 35 cents an hour. The fact of the matter is that we have been paying part 35 cents an hour and part 40 cents an hour. The Postmaster General wanted to reduce all to the 35-cent basis, but the committee concluded that they would let the law remain as it was.

Mr. SISSON. The committee allowed the compensation to remain as it was but changed the law.

Mr. MADDEN. No; the law is not changed.

Mr. SISSON. In the last bill which passed the committee made some changes.

Mr. MADDEN. In what respect?

Mr. SISSON. Well, the language is entirely different, but I would have to get the two and compare them. The compensation is the same.

Mr. MADDEN. The compensation is the same, and the language, if it has been changed at all, has been changed at the suggestion of the Postmaster General.

Mr. SISSON. I do not know at whose suggestion, but the fact is we changed the language and did not adopt the change of compensation.

Mr. MADDEN. We did not adopt the change of compensation because we thought the change of compensation was unjust and is not compensatory for the work that the men do.

Mr. SISSON. At the rate of 35 cents an hour, if they should work a month they would get at the rate of $100 a month.

Mr. MADDEN. Let me tell the gentleman, if I may——

Mr. SISSON. I am glad to find out just why we make this distinction in pay.

Mr. MADDEN. In the first place, in great cities like Boston, New York, Chicago, Philadelphia, St. Louis, San Francisco, New Orleans, and other great cities of America the men who pass the civil-service examination for the position of letter carriers are put on the substitute list.

Mr. SISSON. I understand that.

Mr. MADDEN. But I want to tell the gentleman—just a moment, I will not take up much time. I will get the gentleman more time if he desires it.

Mr. SISSON. I am much obliged. I do not want any more time, except to find out why the difference was made.

Mr. MADDEN. They serve four years as substitutes as a rule, and the average compensation during all of that four years' service amounts to about $30 a month. Every one of those men is obliged to pay at least 10 cents a day car fare, and sometimes 20 cents a day. When they are called away to serve, where they have any temporary employment—when they are called to serve in place of a man off on vacation—they are required to make a greater sacrifice than the man who is there a given period, working, say, a week at a time. There is a difference between 35 and 40 cents in the sacrifice that these two classes of men make, and they ought to be paid for that sacrifice.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SISSON. My time has expired.

Mr. MADDEN. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may be given five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Mississippi be given five minutes more. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SISSON. I shall not use that much time. Now, how much difference is there between the number who will receive 40 cents an hour and those who will receive 35 cents an hour? What is the ratio of numbers?

Mr. MADDEN. Of course a man may serve at one rate this week and at another rate next week. It will depend altogether upon whether he is serving as an auxiliary substitute or serving in the capacity of a substitute in place of a man off on vacation. Those 40-cents-an-hour men are only employed during the summer vacation, that is all, just the summer vacation period.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

I would like to suggest to the gentleman, the chairman of the committee and to the gentlemen of the committee, whether it would not be advisable to make this paragraph permanent law by inserting the word "hereafter"? The committee has decided these schedules of pay, which certainly ought to be approved by anyone who knows anything about the service, and I thought it would obviate the necessity of carrying this phraseology next year by inserting the word "hereafter." I did not know whether that suggestion would meet the approval of the chairman of the committee or not.

Mr. MOON. I have not considered that. I do not know whether it should be done now or not.

Mr. MANN. In that connection, if the gentleman will permit me to call attention to the fact, there is permanent law on the subject now as to temporary clerks and carriers. The act of two years ago provides:

That after June 30, 1914, the pay of substitute letter carriers employed in the places of regular employees absent from duty with pay and of auxiliary and temporary carriers employed at offices where the City Free Delivery Service is already established or may hereafter be established, and of substitute clerks employed in the places of regular employees absent from duty with pay, and of auxiliary and temporary clerks employed in first and second class post offices, shall be at the rate of 35 cents an hour.

That covers what is in the first proviso of this paragraph. That is permanent law. Now, unless you make this permanent law you simply change it for the one year in a little different language. What permanent law there may be in reference to the second proviso I do not recollect, though my recollection was——

Mr. MOON. In the second proviso it is 35 cents, as I understand it.

Mr. MANN. No; I think not. I think there are some provisions where the substitute for the employee absent without pay receives the same pay as the person for whom he is substituting.

Mr. MOON. Here is the act of June 30, 1914, which gives 35 cents an hour.

Mr. MANN. I just read that.

Mr. MOON. The first proviso?

Mr. MANN. The first proviso. It does not cover the case of substitutes who are serving for employees absent without pay. They are now paid 40 cents an hour. I think there was a provision of law designed to pay them practically the same salary as the person for whom they were substituting, they being absent without pay. It was designed for, and, I am sure for a while that it was, the law. It may have been changed to pay them 40 cents an hour. It seems to me that to change just for the year this first proviso in different language will confuse us hereafter, because the permanent law is not repealed. Why not make this in the same language that you had it two years ago, "that after June 30," as it read then, "1914, the pay," and so forth. That is the first proviso. That would really change the law. That is what the gentleman wants to do.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, so far as I am concerned I have no objection to that change. The committee has not considered the matter, but I will consult them in a moment.

Mr. MANN. I think it is confusing to leave it in that way, because you have two laws on the subject to accomplish the same purpose, and leave them on the statute books, the wording of each being different.

Mr. MOON. I move to amend by inserting "Provided, That hereafter," after the word "that."

The CHAIRMAN. Where does that amendment go on?

Mr. MOON. On top of page 15, line 1, after the words "Provided further."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend page 15, by inserting after the word "that" in line 1, the word "hereafter."

Mr. MANN. Oh, no. In line 20, page 14, first.

Page 14, line 20, after the word "that," insert the word "hereafter."

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order on that amendment.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman reserve for a moment the point of order?

Mr. SISSON. I do not care for it to become permanent law.

Mr. MANN. It is permanent law now.

Mr. SISSON. I would not want the permanent law with this difference of pay.

Mr. MANN. It does not affect the difference in pay at all.

Mr. SISSON. You mean the first provision?

Mr. MANN. That is all, and this would only apply to the first proviso.

Mr. SISSON. I have no objection to that, because that is the law now.

Mr. MANN. That is the law now, but in different language, and, as I say, it is confusing.

Mr. SISSON. In other words, if this point of order should not hold it would go back to the other law?

Mr. MANN. Exactly.

Mr. SISSON. Then I withdraw the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON].

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] is withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For vehicle allowance, the hiring of drivers, the rental of vehicles, and the purchase and exchange and maintenance, including stable and garage facilities, of wagons or automobiles for, and the operation of, screen-wagon and city delivery and collection services, $5,565,000: Provided, That the Postmaster General may, in his disbursement of this appropriation, apply a part thereof to the leasing of quarters for the housing of Government-owned automobiles at a reasonable annual rental for a term not exceeding 10 years.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois reserves a point of order on the paragraph.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, this appropriation has been made heretofore, has it not?

Mr. MOON. Oh, yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It provides for the purchase of screen wagons and delivery wagons, automobiles, and so forth?

Mr. MOON. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman state whether it is contemplated in any way to curtail the pneumatic-tube service by the substitution of automobiles?

Mr. MOON. I do not think so under this provision.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Is the usual appropriation made for pneumatic-tube service?

Mr. MOON. Yes, in the same amount.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I see on line 16, page 15, a provision for the transmission of the mail by pneumatic tubes or other similar devices, $976,000.

Mr. MOON. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Is that the same amount that has been appropriated heretofore?

Mr. MOON. That is the same amount that has been appropriated heretofore. We made no change in the item because the commission on the pneumatic-tube service has not yet reported, and we have no further information.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. My inquiry is based on the fact that an inquiry is being made by the commission appointed by the Postmaster General as to the wisdom of continuing the pneumatic-tube service. The gentleman states that the commission not having reported, there is no change in the appropriation for pneumatic-tube service this year.

Mr. MOON. Not at all.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. There are existing contracts for this very desirable pneumatic-tube service that would be affected in certain cities if we began the substitution of automobile service.

Mr. MOON. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. That is a rather unusual amount. Is that in accordance with existing contracts?

Mr. MOON. I understand so. It is purely automatic.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, has my time expired?

The CHAIRMAN. No.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I would like the gentleman from Tennessee to explain, if he will in my time, why it is desired to change the pneumatic-tube service. An inquiry is being made by the Postmaster General. I want to find out what the purpose of the inquiry is. Is it to obtain cheaper service or to do away with the pneumatic tube?

Mr. MOON. Does the gentleman mean the commission?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. MOON. It is to ascertain the proper legitimate cost of this service and whether it ought to be continued where it is or extended further. Does the gentleman inquire as to the value of this whole service to the Postal Service?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Then it is not intended to do away with the pneumatic-tube service?

Mr. MOON. No. It may result in an extension of it.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the gentleman from Tennessee if this appropriation is not more than double that of the current appropriation?

Mr. MOON. For penumatic-tube service?

Mr. MANN. No; the one we have under consideration, for screen-wagon service. It is now $5,565,000. In the last appropriation it was $2,300,000, and in the appropriation last year it was $2,600,000.

Mr. MOON. It is an increase of $3,265,000.

Mr. MANN. What is the reason for this increase of more than 200 per cent?

Mr. MOON. It is a combination of the City Delivery Service, screen delivery, horse hire, and wagon service.

Mr. MANN. I could not hear the gentleman say just what this item now was a combination of in previous appropriations.

Mr. MOON. It is a combination of the appropriations for horse hire, City Delivery Service, screen-wagon service, and the bureau of the Second Assistant's office.

Mr. MANN. It can not be a combination of the City Delivery Service.

Mr. MOON. It is in the City Delivery Service.

Mr. MANN. What is to be covered by this appropriation, which is increased in this paragraph considerably over 100 per cent from the existing law?

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the Chairman permit me? I can elucidate the problem.

Mr. MOON. This is for horse hire and screen-wagon service.

Mr. MANN. The present law provides for horse hire and screen-wagon service at $2,300,000. This provides for the same thing, with a change to automobiles, $5,565,000. Now, I assume that somewhere they have cut something off. This is the screen-wagon service, and it expressly says so.

Mr. STAFFORD. If the gentleman will permit, this is a combination of two items. In prior appropriation bills we have carried under the First Assistant Postmaster General an allowance to postmasters for the collection and delivery of mail by collectors with horse-drawn vehicles, and we have also carried under the Second Assistant Postmaster General an allowance for screen-wagon service. During the past year the Postmaster General has consolidated those two services, bringing the screen-wagon collection service and the former city delivery collection service into one item, and this appropriation is but $665,000 increase over the two combined appropriations of last year's appropriation bill.

Mr. MOON. If the gentleman will look on pages 112 and 133 of the hearings, he will find the reasons for the combination; screen-wagon service, $3,210,510; city delivery horse hire, $2,350,000; total amount, $5,560,510.

Mr. MANN. Now, what is the object in combining in one item what heretofore we had segregated in various items?

Mr. MOON. It is going under one bureau now and it was under two before.

Mr. MANN. That fact does not matter. The Post Office bill at best is made up largely of lump-sum appropriations, more so than any other appropriation bill that passes through Congress.

Mr. MOON. The explanation of the department is better than any I can give to the gentleman, and so I will read it. I read:

This service is a combination of the present screen-wagon service, which will be transferred from the bureau of the Second Assistant to this bureau on July 1, 1916, and city delivery horse hire. Expenditures will be made from this appropriation to reimburse city letter carriers for furnishing wagons or automobiles, for the rental of wagons or automobiles under contract or agreement from outside parties, and for the purchase, exchange, and maintenance, including stable and garage facilities, of wagons or automobiles for the delivery and collection of mail at city delivery offices and for the transportation of mail in bulk to and from railway depots.

The expenditures for these items for the fiscal year 1915 and the estimated expenditures for 1916 and 1917 follow:

Screen-wagon service	$2,610,440	$2,867,000	$3,210,510
City delivery horse hire	2,060,000	2,200,000	2,350,000
Total	4,670,440	5,067,000	5,560,510
Percentage of increase over previous year	10.82	8.49	9.74

The proposed consolidation of these appropriations will make it possible to use the same equipment for the transportation of mail to and from railway depots, for city collection and delivery service, and for the necessary extension of both services. Experiments conducted under authority of Congress in the appropriation act of March 9, 1914, have demonstrated that these services can be administered more effectively and economically as one service. In 13 cities where it has been placed in operation during the past year an estimated saving at the annual rate of $48,637.62 has been effected.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] make a point or order?

Mr. MANN. No. I withdraw the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois withdraws the point of order.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. MADDEN. While this appropriation was under consideration in the committee the Second Assistant Postmaster General was called and interrogated, and it was disclosed that he had substituted government ownership in the screen-wagon service in the city of St. Louis, in the city of Chicago, in the city of Indianapolis, in the city of Washington, and in the city of Philadelphia.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, so that we can understand the gentleman's remarks, will he state what he is referring to?

Mr. MADDEN. I am referring to this appropriation of $5,565,000.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. What is the paper which the gentleman has in his hand?

Mr. MADDEN. This is just a memorandum that I have.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I thought it was a report.

Mr. MADDEN. I contended that it was not possible to conduct economically a screen-wagon service by automobiles owned and operated by the Government of the United States in the loop district of Chicago. That district is only about a mile square. The average distance of the run between the depot and the post office is five-eighths of a mile. The shortest run is 0.13 of a mile and the longest 2.16 miles. The average speed to be made, including stops, loading, and unloading time, can not exceed 1.6 miles an hour. I contended that automobiles operated under such conditions must, as a matter of necessity, be more extravagant than a service operated by horses and wagons.

To prove the force of my position I may say to the House that 98 per cent of all the movement of traffic in the loop district in Chicago, where the loading and unloading is done within the loop, is by wagon. But the Second Assistant Postmaster General says that he could do it more economically, and, of course, I do not want to take serious issue with him. He has already expended $210,000 for automobiles for use in Chicago, and I do not know how much more he will expend before he gets his Government ownership scheme complete. I presume that I would not overstate the case if I said that nearly a million dollars have been expended for automobiles by the Post Office Department within the last year. Whether they have had any authority to make the purchases or not, I do not know. But, however, they have made the purchases, and in response to a query from myself in the committee the Second Assistant Postmaster General made a report in which he sets forth the fact that in Chicago he will save $157,990; that in Detroit he will save $47,276.76; that in Philadelphia he will save $102,935.34; in St. Louis, $84,728.30; and he says that in the city of Washington during the last year he has saved $37,229.38, or a total of $430,160.14 in the five cities that I have mentioned.

My original purpose was to introduce some sort of a limitation on the right of the Postmaster General to institute this kind of service, under certain conditions, where I thought it would be more extravagant than the horses and wagons. But the statement made by the Second Assistant Postmaster General is entitled to some degree of consideration; but when I asked him in the face of his statement to the effect that he had saved $430,000 in a single year if he would be willing to accept a reduction in the amount appropriated equal to the amount of his saving on the face of his statement, he said he would not, because he did not know what the effect would be.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. COX. I am thoroughly with the gentleman from Chicago on this item. I think he is clearly right.

Mr. MADDEN. I do not want to introduce anything. I simply want to make a statement.

Mr. COX. I thought we agreed in the committee upon the gentleman's limitation, but I do not find it in the bill.

Mr. MADDEN. I have here the limitation that I intended to introduce; but I think, in the face of the statement made by the Second Assistant Postmaster General, it is only fair to give him a chance to try out his scheme, and I do not want to embarrass him. My limitation, if it was introduced, would provide—

That no part of this appropriation shall be expended for the purchase, hire, operation, or repair of automobiles or other motor vehicles in the conduct of screen-wagon service in any section of any city of the United States where the congestion makes it impossible to operate an automobile or other motor vehicle less than 30 miles within an eight-hour day, including waiting, loading, and unloading time.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MADDEN. I ask unanimous consent for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that his time be extended two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MADDEN. Now, I had a talk with the Second Assistant Postmaster General about this, and he says he thinks it would be only fair to give him a chance to try out what he believes he can do. I want to be fair with him, and I want to give him that chance to try it out, but I think, too, that he ought to be fair with us, and that he ought to be willing to accept a reduction in the appropriation to the extent that he says he makes the saving. That is only fair, but he says he is unwilling to do that, because he does not know.

Now, this did not come out in the hearings. I talked with him personally afterwards about it. For example, he says he has made a saving of thirty-seven thousand and some odd hundreds of dollars in the city of Washington during the last year by the introduction of automobiles. He says that he has done for $18,000 what cost formerly $55,000. I said, "How many automobiles have you got in Washington?" He told me he had 14. Now, everybody knows that you can not operate 14 automobiles and pay the salaries of their chauffeurs for $18,000 a year. Why, the other day I saw a statement in one of the papers to the effect that the Secretary of Labor stated before the Appropriations Committee that it cost $1,368 for repairs on his automobile last year. Now, my contention is that the statement made by the Second Assistant Postmaster General to the effect that he can do for $18,000 in the city of Washington what it formerly cost $55,000 to do is erroneous. It can not be done. Well, what can be done? He can not do for less than $42,000 what he says he is doing for $18,000, and anybody who has a head on him can figure it out for himself. But he says he has done it. Well, if he has done it he has done it without making the charges that ought to be made against the service. Of course, if you do not charge anything but the gasoline, the oil, and the repairs to the automobile it is easy enough to say that you can run 14 automobiles for a year for $18,000; but the man does not live who can employ a driver, buy the tires, repair the chassis of the automobile, pay the ordinary repairs to the machine, buy the gasoline, buy the grease and the oil and everything else that goes with it, and pay the insurance and the liability that is connected with it, without having that machine cost him at least $3,000 a year. I run automobiles myself, and I know what they cost, and the statement made by the Second Assistant Postmaster General can not be a statement of facts, because the man does not live who can do the things that he says he is doing.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The gentleman from Illinois withdraws the pro forma amendment.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I know nothing about the facts personally that the gentleman from Illinois speaks of, but I have a letter from the postmaster at Chicago to the Second Assistant Postmaster General which I ask unanimous consent to put in the RECORD. It shows the opinion of the postmaster at Chicago on the subject.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

The letter is as follows:

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
SECOND ASSISTANT POSTMASTER GENERAL,
Washington, February 7, 1916.

Hon. JOHN A. MOON,
Chairman Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR CHAIRMAN: I am inclosing herewith copy of a letter from Postmaster D. A. Campbell, of Chicago, Ill., on the successful operation of the department's automobile service through the "loop" section, and in connection therewith beg to call your attention to the last four paragraphs of the letter, showing that the automobiles are operating through the "loop" with double the speed of the horse-drawn vehicles.

Very sincerely,

OTTO PRAEGER,
Second Assistant Postmaster General.

UNITED STATES POST OFFICE,
Chicago, Ill., February 5, 1916.

Hon. OTTO PRAEGER,
Second Assistant Postmaster General,
Washington, D. C.

SIR: In accordance with departmental instructions, additional motor-vehicle service on route 435045, superseding mail-messenger (former screen-wagon) service, operated by Contractor Seger on route 235081, was established at 12.01 a. m., February 1, 1916.

Mr. Corridon witnessed the midnight inauguration, as you are aware, and he has doubtless advised you that no insurmountable difficulties were encountered and that the service was in successful operation when he left here the following morning.

Although it was necessary to arrange an almost endless number of details with but few weeks' advance notice, yet this new service, comprising over 1,200 trips daily, has been handled successfully from the start, as evidenced by the fact that there were but nine instances on the first day, six on the second day, and four on the third day where trains were not connected on schedule time. In other words, the records indicate that 99.47 per cent of the mails were handled without delay during the first three days of operation.

This record speaks for itself, and it at least proves the ability of this service to handle the business properly, as far as concerns the supervision necessary for the expeditious dispatch of the mails. Furthermore, as soon as all concerned, including dispatchers and chauffeurs, become more familiar with their duties the record made during the past three days will be improved upon.

In this connection it may be stated that this record has never been equaled for the first few days' operation under any previous new contract, one of the contractors—who later rendered satisfactory service—having from 40 to 50 failures charged daily for several months during the early stages of the installation of the service.

In regard to the much-discussed question of speed, you are advised that we have already had enough experience to prove that autotrucks will be able to travel between depots in the loop district in many instances in less than one-half the time required for horse-drawn vehicles. As an illustration, this office has been advised that a heavy mail left Union Depot yesterday for Illinois Central Depot with but 11 minutes time in which to make train connections. It requires from 20 to 25 minutes to make this trip by wagon, but it was made by autotruck in 8 minutes, and this large quantity of mail for points between Chicago and New Orleans, which otherwise would have been delayed, made the train connection.

In regard to the cost of operation, it may be said it is already evident that in this respect also the outcome will be very satisfactory.

In my opinion the success of this new venture is assured; therefore it appears safe to congratulate the department without further delay.

Respectfully,

D. A. CAMPBELL, Postmaster.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I want to say that a copy of that letter was sent to me and I know what it said. The postmaster at Chicago writes the Second Assistant Postmaster General congratulating him on the success of the introduction of the automobile service in that district. The letter was written at 9 o'clock in the morning of the day when the automobiles were substituted for wagons at 12 o'clock at night, and all the information they had on the subject was the result of a few hours' test with a single automobile. There you have the letter and you can tell what it is worth.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman permit me to make a suggestion?

Mr. MADDEN. If I have the floor.

Mr. CANNON. As near as I can ascertain after personal experience, if you buy an automobile, pay for its running, all the expenses, the wear and tear, everything connected with it, taking into account depreciation, it will cost you upward of 40 cents a mile to run it.

Mr. MADDEN. Three thousand dollars a year to run it, if you run it.

Mr. CANNON. Now I am very skeptical about the use of automobiles in the mail service, especially in the country.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. I would like to inquire of some one how many of these automobiles have been purchased by the department during the current fiscal year, and whether they are all of the same kind?

Mr. MOON. I will say that I do not know.

Mr. MADDEN. I do not know how many have been purchased, but I can say that in Chicago most of the machines have been purchased from the White Automobile Co. Bids were submitted by a number of companies. The Studebaker submitted a bid for a half-ton truck and the White Co. a bid for a half-ton truck. The Studebaker's bid was $975 apiece for a half-ton truck. The White Co.'s bid for the same-sized truck was $1,975, and was the highest bid. There was a difference of $1,000 in the two types of machine of equal capacity. The three-quarter-ton truck which the Studebaker Co. bid on was purchased, and the Second Assistant Postmaster General said the reason the half-ton truck was not purchased of the Studebaker Co. was that it was not so good a type of truck as the White truck; that the three-quarter-ton truck was a good type of truck. I do not know and I do not pretend to say, but it does not seem to me possible that between two half-ton trucks made by two bidding companies almost in the same class there could be $1,000 difference. That was the price paid, however. I do not know how many trucks have been bought, except in Chicago they have purchased 78. The price paid was $210,000, and the majority of them are White trucks, at a price $1,000 more than trucks of equal capacity and equal utility.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I do not know what the facts are. I am not prone even to listen to scandalous charges concerning administrative officers which, as a rule, are not well founded. I have been informed by letter from some of the automobile people that the department practically buys nothing but White machines all over the country. Whether this is true or not I do not know. It is said that they provide, in the main, specifications which require White machines, and that they pay considerably higher prices for White machines than they could obtain the same service for from other companies. I do not know what the facts may be, but it would be very unfortunate if some one—certainly not the Second Assistant Postmaster General—if some one in the introduction of automobiles in the Postal Service was operating so as to give preference to the manufacturers of one kind of machine when there are so many manufacturers to-day making serviceable automobile trucks.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit, I wish to say to the gentleman from Illinois that, while I hesitated to make the statement made by his colleague [Mr. MADDEN] a while ago, it is rumored that in the investigation of the pneumatic-tube service in Philadelphia it has been incidentally connected with the purchase of trucks, and that the trucks have been purchased from the White Co. So it appears that the rumors are broadcast.

Mr. MANN. It might also be said that there was a good deal of scandal at different times about the pneumatic-tube service and its introduction, some of which very likely may have been justified, but whether it was justified or not, there is no reason for doing the same thing over again in reference to the purchase of automobile trucks.

The Post Office Department tries to be clean and above suspicion. Undoubtedly that is the desire of the officials in charge, but we all know perfectly well that there are some automobile concerns in the country who have salesmen that resort to most anything to sell their machines. I think the Post Office Department ought to give them all a square deal [applause] and not draw specifications so that there is only one concern that can manufacture them, and sell them to the Government at a much higher price than can be obtained from other manufacturers.

M. [illegible]IBBLE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois withdraws his pro forma amendment, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For mail-messenger service, $2,193,000.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 15, at the end of line 15, insert: "Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be used unless a fair compensation be paid commensurate with the work to be performed."

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on that.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I simply want to explain to the gentlemen of the committee that this is a class of service that is little understood. I believe that it is the most underpaid service that exists in this country to-day. All you gentlemen who represent districts that have small towns have these mail messengers in your districts, and they are receiving a wage that is not a living wage. I understand that the Post Office Department will say that the reason for this is that it is left to the lowest bidder. I wish to say with all due consideration for the gentlemen on the other side that this is not the case. I have been a postmaster for some 13 years, and during all that time I tried to get the wage of the mail messengers increased to a fair amount, but I never could succeed.

Mr. LOBECK. But that was under a Republican administration.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Yes; I will admit that; but it is worse now than what it was before. Everything that the Republican administration in the way of economy did the present administration has indorsed, and has gone one better, several times better. I hope the gentlemen on the other side will let a little of this sunshine flow into their souls and remain there for at least 10 minutes.

Mr. MOON. Does the gentleman know that under the law this service can be terminated by the messenger on notice of 30 days?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I understand that is so, but it is seldom done, because this service is usually performed by decrepit old men, who can secure no other position and who must take this pittance from the Government or starve.

Mr. MOON. But he has the right to do it if he wants to.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Yes, to starve. Not only that, but although the job is supposed to be on a competitive basis, such is not a fact. You do not let the job to the lowest bidder unless the bid suits the fancy of the man higher up. The postmaster is told that an inspector will visit his office, and that he will be disciplined unless he secures a messenger at the price set by the department, wheedles, hires, or inveigles some poor unfortunate who is out of work to take the work for a sum that would make the lowest employee on the street blush with shame.

Mr. MOON. But the gentleman is talking about something he evidently knows nothing about.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. And I offer this amendment. This amendment is in conformity with the words of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON], who said the department was willing always to pay fair wages.

Mr. DILL. What is the wage received by these messengers?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. If you have a small town having a post office situated more than a quarter of a mile from the depot, then you must have a mail messenger, and I will venture the assertion that if any of the gentlemen here present will take enough time when they visit the town, they will find an old man working for this Government for probably $25 or perhaps $30 a month, and he has to get up before 6 o'clock in the morning and work practically all day until 8 or 9 o'clock at night, and furnish a rig to haul the mail from the depot to the post office. He will not be getting over $25 or $30 a month, and in some cases a great deal less. I say that that is not a living wage.

Mr. DILL. How much would these messengers receive under the proposed amendment?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. They would receive fair wages, based on the average wage paid in that town, and they are not receiving that now. If the opposition party insist on a point of order in order to dispose of this amendment, it puts itself squarely on record as opposed to a fair wage for the workingman.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the transmission of mail by pneumatic tubes or other similar devices, $976,000.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

Page 15, at the end of line 17, insert:

"The Postmaster General is hereby authorized in his discretion, with the consent of the Secretary of the Treasury, to utilize for the transmission of mail the pneumatic tube connecting the customhouse and the appraiser's stores in the city of New York."

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order on that.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I will ask the gentleman to reserve it. If he will reserve it, I think I can convince him.

Mr. COX. I doubt that very much, but I will reserve it for five minutes.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I do not think the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COX] will make the point, because I have better confidence in his business judgment. The situation in relation to this amendment is this: Connecting the customhouse and the appraiser's stores in New York City is a pneumatic tube, constructed and owned by the Government. It is being used for not to exceed 6 hours a day at 15-minute intervals. I have talked with gentlemen in the postal service of New York City, and with gentlemen in the customs service and in the appraiser's stores. The gentlemen in the Postal Service say that if they are given this tube they can, without any appreciable additional expense, operate it for 20 hours a day and lengthen the time in which a man can mail a letter to go on a foreign ship 2 hours for every ship. The foreign station is directly across the street from the appraiser's stores. I have talked with the appraiser, Mr. Tegue, a very good man, though a Democrat.

Mr. COX. I indorse that statement.

Mr. BENNET. I thought I would get the gentleman's attention finally. He agrees with me that that being a thing owned by the Government, the larger view ought to be taken, and that this permission, because that is all it is, ought to be given to the two departments to utilize that tube already there, constructed by the Government at Government expense, and which, if utilized as these two departments are willing to utilize it, without any great additional expense, will serve the convenience of every person in the United States who uses the foreign mail, because it will set back the time of the closing of the foreign mail for every ship some two hours.

Now, I hope the gentleman will not——

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BENNET. I will.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman inform the committee as to the nearest postal station from the customhouse which now has the pneumatic-tube service?

Mr. BENNET. There is a postal station in the customhouse.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is the present postal-tube service in the customhouse so situated that it can be extended to the Government-owned tube service running to the appraiser's stores?

Mr. BENNET. It is.

Mr. STAFFORD. What is the distance between the customhouse and the appraiser's stores?

Mr. BENNET. Two miles.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is the tube of the same size—8 or 10 inches?

Mr. BENNET. It is an 8-inch tube. It is the same size as the other tubes now being used in the city of New York, and the additional station will save the haul of the mail 2 miles, all the foreign mail. I hope, in view of that explanation, that the gentleman from Indiana will not make his point of order.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I offer another amendment.

I move to strike out, in line 17, the figures "976,000" and insert in lieu thereof the figures "1,146,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 15, line 17, strike out "976,000" and insert "1,146,000."

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the amendment.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I will say to the gentleman from Illinois that the amendment is not subject to the point of order because under the act approved June 26, 1906, the Postmaster General was authorized to enter into a contract not exceeding, in the aggregate, $1,250,000, and the total I propose is $1,146,000. Therefore the amendment is not subject to the point of order.

Mr. MADDEN. I will reserve the point of order, anyway.

Mr. BENNET. I do not care; if the gentleman wants to make it, I will let the Chair rule on it.

Mr. MADDEN. I make the point of order.

Mr. BENNET. I send the law to the desk.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. MADDEN. No. I think it changes existing law, and therefore is subject to the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not think it does.

Mr. MADDEN. Of course if it is not subject to the point of order——

The CHAIRMAN. And the Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, the object of this amendment is to extend the pneumatic-tube service of the city of New York into the county of The Bronx and on to Washington Heights. Ten years ago, against the opposition of the then Post Office Department, the Congress of the United States provided for an adequate pneumatic-tube service in the city of New York, as the service was then desired, upon the promise of the representatives from New York City that if they were given adequate service there would be an increase in the postal receipts of New York City. Now, what have been the facts? In the 10 years between 1905 and 1915 while the population of the county of New York has not increased at all—oh, well, 100,000 in a total of over 2,000,000—the postal receipts of the city of New York have increased from $16,000,000 in 1905 to $30,000,000 in 1915. Now, this particular section which would be benefited by these tubes but which has not had the advantage of these tubes has had this history. In the same period the county of The Bronx has increased in population 128 per cent. The postal receipts have increased 160 per cent, not at all in proportion to the increase in postal receipts of the county of New York where there has been no increase in population. Now, why has there been the increase in the county of New York and not in the county of The Bronx? Because in a large city the question of the postal facilities is a competitive question. The post office competes with the telephone, it competes with the telegraph, and it competes with the private messenger. If I want to send a message from my office in Wall Street to any place south of One hundred and twenty-fifth Street, the northern terminus of the tube, I send a letter under a 2-cent stamp knowing that I can send the letter and get a reply the same day. If I want to send a message out into my district, which is north of One hundred and twenty-seventh Street, I use the telephone, the telegraph, or private messenger because I know I can not get a letter up there the same day and get a reply.

If this Congress will do for the county of The Bronx what the then Congress did for the county of New York 10 years ago in increasing its postal facilities, they will get something like the same rate of increase, and the county of The Bronx is entitled to a good deal of consideration. There are only two cities in the United States which are materially larger than that county, those being the cities of Chicago and Philadelphia—a county about the size of the cities of St. Louis and Boston—and there are 13 States—North and South Dakota, Rhode Island, New Hampshire, Montana, Utah, Vermont, New Mexico, Idaho, Arizona, Delaware, Wyoming, and Nevada—each one of which is smaller in its total population than this county which makes this little request for an expansion in its postal facilities, to which it is entitled on the ground of population; to which it is entitled on the ground of business; and to which it is entitled from the outlook in the future.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BENNET. Certainly.

Mr. COX. Suppose we increase the appropriation $170,000. We do not know whether that sum will be sufficient. Who prepared the data?

Mr. BENNET. I have. The cost of the pneumatic-tube service is $17,000 per annum per mile. This would extend the service 10 miles. It would take the service out to Washington Heights—would take it out to the present Station "R," or to the place where Station "R" will be when the new building is erected.

Mr. COX. Can the pneumatic-tube service be extended as cheaply now as it could 10 years ago?

Mr. BENNET. I will say to the gentleman this, that this is a patented article, and the maximum price that can be paid is provided for by statute.

The company builds the tube service. The Government has nothing to do with that.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. BENNET. May I have three minutes more?

Mr. HULBERT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. HULBERT] asks unanimous consent that his colleague's time be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. MOON. I move that all debate on this paragraph close in 10 minutes.

Mr. HULBERT. Reserving the right to object, I would like to have five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] moves that all debate on this paragraph close in 10 minutes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I would like to ask the gentleman to make that 15 minutes.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I move that it be done in an hour.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman will not do that on my account.

Mr. MOON. Yes. We debated on this question once before.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. My remarks do not relate to the pneumatic-tube matter. It is on another item.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. HULBERT] asks unanimous consent that his colleague [Mr. BENNET] be permitted to address the House for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BENNET. Answering the question of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cox] I was about to say that the comparative cost of construction does not enter into the question, because under the contract the pneumatic-tube company, the owner of the patented device, has to construct, maintain, and operate these tubes.

Now, 10 years ago the then Representatives from New York City said that if these additional facilities were given to the city they would give them increased postal receipts, and we have redeemed that promise to the extent of $14,000,000 of increase over what the receipts were in 1905.

Mr. FINLEY. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. BENNET. Certainly.

Mr. FINLEY. Who made that promise or guarantee?

Mr. BENNET. Every Member of Congress at that time representing the county of New York.

Mr. FINLEY. Did you give bonds?

Mr. BENNET. We did not have to do so. Our word was good.

Mr. HULBERT. I would like to ask my colleague from New York if the gentlemen who made the promise at that time did not make good?

Mr. BENNET. We certainly did. I am now speaking, I am sure, in behalf of my colleagues from New York when I say that we will make the same promise in relation to the postal facilities to Washington Heights and into the Bronx. In just one moment, because I do not intend to take the entire five minutes, it is difficult for one who is not familiar with it to conceive of the growth and progress that there is in one of the outlying sections of these large cities. I saw 40,000 people move into my own district in one year, the one I represented, the old seventeenth, and I call attention to the fact that the county of the Bronx, which my colleagues, Mr. HULBERT, Mr. OGLESBY, and myself, represent in part, has increased 128 per cent in 10 years. It is from communities like that that you have to get your profits for the Postal Service.

Mr. MEEKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BENNET. Certainly.

Mr. MEEKER. It seems to me that there is only one question before us here. I would like to ask the gentleman if he has any data as to the moving of all the mail in bulk? Is it the gentleman's opinion that the extension of the pneumatic-tube service would give to that district a service superior to the installation of the automobile service?

Mr. BENNET. It would give a service superior to the automobile service. And the way it would work out for the general good would be this, as I explained to the committee: In a large city—and the gentleman being from St. Louis, which is a large city, ought to know it—the service is competitive. It competes with the telephone, telegraph, and district messenger service, and the minute you increase the facilities you increase the receipts in a far greater ratio than you increase your expenditures. Taking the way the figures are arranged in connection with other cities, I do not think it is absolutely accurate; but from the way the figures are returned from New York City the profits to the service in New York City are, in round numbers, $20,000,000 a year out of $30,000,000 of receipts. That is certainly worth while getting.

Mr. MEEKER. Just one further question. Are we to understand, then, that the residents and the merchants of that district to which this service is going would prefer, of the two services, to have the tube service to increase their receipts rather than the automobile service?

Mr. BENNET. Not for that reason; but they would prefer to have the tube service, because it would increase the rapidity of the delivery of their mail.

Mr. MEEKER. That would necessarily increase the receipts, would it not?

Mr. BENNET. It would increase the receipts. It does both.

Mr. MEEKER. But between the two they prefer the pneumatic-tube service to the auto service?

Mr. BENNET. Certainly.

Mr. HULBERT. I would like to ask my colleague if it is not true that the county of Bronx is separated from the county of New York by a river, and if the commerce on that river is not something in excess of $700,000,000 per annum, and that a number of bridges extend across that river, so that the installation of a pneumatic-tube service, by reason of the opening of the bridges to the passage of the commerce, would be superior to the automobile service?

Mr. BENNET. I will say to my colleague that a number of those bridges are closed from five to seven hours a day.

Mr. HULBERT. And is there not now a proposition before the War Department to extend the hours during which these bridges will be closed?

Mr. BENNET. Yes.

Mr. HULBERT. And is it not a fact that if these bridges are closed between those hours it will materially interfere with the delivery of mail matter between the city of New York and the county of Bronx?

Mr. BENNET. Certainly. If we had a tube going under the river, those outside things would not matter at all.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

I think it is the right and privilege of every Member of the House to speak for his constituency, and I do not hesitate to speak for mine when I think it proper to do so; nor do I think it becomes the chairman of any committee in charge of a bill upon the floor to get nervous because any particular Representative seeks to speak for his constituents.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. FESS. I would like to know if that is the only time any Member of the House has a right to speak?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will say that there are times when Members of the House in charge of bills may be a little testy about allowing discussion when there ought to be an opportunity for fair and open debate. Chairmen of committees sometimes seek to rush their bills through without giving Representatives a chance to say what they desire to say in conformity with the wishes of their constituents; and sometimes there may be reason for this. I do not intend to reflect upon the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON], because ordinarily he is one of the most courteous chairmen of committees now in control of the affairs of the House.

Mr. MOON. What has the gentleman now to say about him?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman suggested a moment ago that I might take an hour, implying that I might hire a hall if I wanted to, in order to say a few words about the pneumatic-tube service.

Mr. MOON. I did not say anything about the gentleman talking an hour or about his hiring a hall.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That was the inference to be drawn from the suggestion that the gentleman made about yielding an hour.

Mr. MOON. I did not propose to yield to the gentleman for an hour—not particularly the gentleman, but not to anybody.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Of course, if the gentleman meant it to apply generally, I do not take it particularly to myself; but I want to say to the gentleman from Tennessee that this is my first appearance in the discussion of this bill.

Mr. MOON. Oh, the gentleman discussed it an hour ago.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I asked the gentleman a few questions a while ago with a view to putting him on record. That is all. I know of no one else to whom I can go for more authentic information than to the chairman of the committee.

I desired to know of the gentleman whether the purchase of extra automobiles in the large cities by the Postal Department meant the disuse or abandonment of the pneumatic-tube service, and the gentleman said he understood that was not the purpose of the purchase of these automobiles; and that led the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] and his colleague [Mr. MADDEN] to make some comments on the purchase of automobiles by the Post Office Department, indicating that the Postal Service was buying a particular make of automobiles, when it might not be entirely fair to other automobile makers and when some competition should be afforded.

Now, what I intended to say is that the people in my city are not in favor of the abandonment of the pneumatic-tube service. I do not speak for the owner or the contractor having charge of the pneumatic-tube service. I have no interest in the people who control that service except that I insist they shall keep their contracts when they make contracts with the Government and that the Government shall deal fairly with them. But I want to express the views of substantial business men and users of the Postal Service, who do not believe that the use of automobiles, in which the mail matter must be carried from the post office to the railroad stations or to the post office from the stations, should be substituted for the pneumatic tubes.

With the auto service the mail must be carried out on the street and then lumbered along crowded highways to the railroad stations, where it must be rehandled, subject, of course, to accident and loss. I agree with the gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET] and with his colleague [Mr. HULBERT] that it is a matter of great delay to the mails in large cities—this rehandling and these stoppages as between the post offices and the train sheds.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes; I yield to the gentleman. He is an expert on postal affairs, and I am glad to yield to him.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman know the percentage of mail that goes through the tube in these large cities?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I do not know much about the figures, but I know that all great trade bodies of my city, like the bourse, the commercial exchange, the chamber of commerce, the board of trade, and the maritime exchange, favor the continuation of the pneumatic-tube service, and have viewed somewhat with alarm the tendency on the part of the department to purchase, as a substitute, automobiles, which are conducted at great expense and at considerable risk, so far as the carrying of the mails is concerned, and at possible delay to the service. They object to the substitution of that service for the pneumatic-tube service, which is now working admirably in our city. I wanted to express these views on behalf of the people whom I represent, and I am very glad to have the opportunity to do so.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Chairman, the amount of money carried here—$976,000—is amply sufficient to take care of all existing contracts for pneumatic-tube service in transporting the mail, and in addition to that there is added $9,200 to take care of adjustments made necessary by a change in the stations along the lines, so that there is nothing in this proposition here. It may be, and I have no doubt that it can be shown by the representatives from the various cities, that the pneumatic-tube service would be of value to their particular cities and various localities in those cities.

Now, what the gentleman says in reference to New York is equally true with reference to Cleveland, Ohio, Pittsburgh, Pa.; St. Louis, Mo.; and other cities that I might mention, including San Francisco, and so on; but the policy of the Government has been for many years not to extend this service at the present time, but to find out first how efficient it is from an economic standpoint.

I remember when Gen. Stewart was Second Assistant Postmaster General he made a statement that he would not advise an extension of this service at this time, and I presume that he is the greatest postal expert in this country. I believe that he is. I know that he is not prejudiced against the pneumatic-tube service, and I want to say to the gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET] this, that a very small percentage of the mails in New York City is transmitted through the pneumatic tubes. It is a very small percentage indeed, although I do not remember the exact percentage, but it is a fact that when the automobile service was put on in New York City it added vastly to the expedition of the mails in New York City. There is no question about that. That is contained in the testimony in past years at the hearings before the Post Office Committee, so that I submit that this amendment here, adding some $56,000, I believe——

Mr. MOON. One hundred and seventy thousand dollars——

Mr. FINLEY. Yes; $170,000—is warranted. There are no conditions existing that would call for this additional appropriation. There is a commission studying this question now. What their report will be I do not know, but I presume it will be a report covering the conditions as to the pneumatic-tube service in full. Then Congress will have full information. That commission is made up, I believe, largely of Members of the House and of the Senate. Their report has not come to us as yet, but when it does come we shall know more about the service than we do now.

The policy of Congress, even before that commission was appointed, was that this service should not be extended for the present. We have contracts outstanding calling for $976,000, including these adjustments that I speak of. We have provided for that. We are carrying in this bill every dollar that is necessary to carry out those contracts under existing law, and I submit that the amendment should be voted down.

Mr. HULBERT. Mr. Chairman, I desire to speak in opposition to the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to strike out the last word.

It seems regretable indeed that gentlemen who are apparently not familiar with the conditions existing in the Borough and county of The Bronx in the city of New York should have the temerity to deny that those conditions do not render the exception which should prevail here. As I have attempted to bring out in the questions which I put to my colleague, the author of the amendment, we are faced with a situation, so far as the county of The Bronx is concerned, where, by reason of the constantly growing traffic carried upon the Harlem River, which separates the Borough of The Bronx from the Borough of Manhattan, and by reason of the necessity for opening the draw bridges upon that river, the people who live upon the other side of the Harlem River, who now number over 700,000, can place absolutely no reliance upon the mail service as at present conducted.

Mr. FINLEY. May I ask the gentleman, is the point to which he would extend the pneumatic tube a business section, or is it a residential section?

Mr. HULBERT. It is a business section.

Mr. FINLEY. All of it?

Mr. HULBERT. All of it, solid blocks of stores with residences, of course; and manufacturing and industrial establishments, just the same as the down-town district of New York City.

Mr. FINLEY. The point to which the gentleman would extend the tube line?

Mr. HULBERT. Yes; One hundred and forty-ninth Street and Third Avenue is in the heart of the business district of The Bronx.

Mr. MOON. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HULBERT. Yes.

Mr. MOON. How many deliveries of mail have you per day in that part of the city?

Mr. HULBERT. I do not know how many, but I think seven.

Mr. MOON. I can tell the gentleman. There are nine.

Mr. HULBERT. I know there are nine in the business district down town, but I will ask the chairman of the committee if he is certain there are more than seven deliveries in the Borough of The Bronx?

Mr. MOON. There are seven deliveries in the residential district of New York.

Mr. HULBERT. What part of New York; Manhattan?

Mr. MOON. And nine in the business district, as against about four and two in other cities of the country. You have the pneumatic-tube service and the automobile service, and I think you had better wait a little.

Mr. HULBERT. Do not the results justify all we ask? Is there any other city which could turn in a profit to the Federal Government of $18,800,000 per annum with nine deliveries in the business district and seven in the residential district?

Mr. MOON. I am not objecting to your having them. I would be glad to have you have more if you need them, but I only want to make this impression upon you, that when New York is getting three or four times the service that other cities of the country are getting and it has got this tube and all of this special service, it would be very well for you to wait before you ask for anything more until the commission appointed by Congress to investigate this question can report and say whether you ought to have it or not.

Mr. HULBERT. I would say to the chairman of the committee that we are asking for more because the conditions existing in the Borough of The Bronx are so imperative that we can not wait until this commission makes its report; and upon that point I desire to say, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. MOON. Do you mean to say that the conditions are so imperative for another tube?

Mr. HULBERT. So imperative for another tube.

Mr. MOON. Why did you not bring us some evidence of that fact before the committee? You did not come before the committee.

Mr. HULBERT. No; I did not appear before the committee, because I did not have the opportunity. I know that the matter has been in the hands of the Postmaster General, and I believe that he is proceeding upon a false theory, as the Assistant Postmaster General has written that there were 20 miles of tubes to be installed, whereas, as a matter of fact, we are only asking for 3 miles, and it may be that your information in this matter is predicated upon the false assumption of the Postmaster General's Department that we want 20 miles, when, as a matter of fact, we are only asking for 3 miles' extension.

Mr. MOON. But, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. HULBERT. I decline to yield further when I have so little time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. MOON. Very well.

Mr. HULBERT. Now, we are making no complaint in regard to the tube service in the Borough of Manhattan; but part of my district is in the Borough of The Bronx, and I want to emphasize the fact that the commercial advancement of the Borough of The Bronx makes its accommodation by pneumatic-tube service just as essential as that of the Borough of Manhattan, and it is because the Borough of The Bronx has inadequate facilities that I urge the inclusion of this amendment for the purpose of giving us a 3-mile extension at a cost of $51,000 per annum to the Government.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET], the colleague of the gentleman who is now speaking, said they wanted 10 miles. Does the gentleman agree with his colleague?

Mr. HULBERT. My colleague was asking an extension in addition to that to which I am specifically directing your attention. My colleague asks an extension to Washington Heights, which is in his congressional district.

Mr. MADDEN. Would that make 13 miles, or 10 miles?

Mr. HULBERT. I think that would make 10 miles altogether.

Mr. MADDEN. Yours and his together would make 10 miles?

Mr. HULBERT. Yes; approximately.

Mr. MADDEN. Then you do want 10 altogether?

Mr. HULBERT. I am emphasizing my interest in the request of The Bronx Board of Trade, in my district, whose communications I have before me, and my constituents who will be accommodated, and the extension which they desire is for a distance of 3 miles.

Mr. MADDEN. And the gentleman does not care about his colleague?

Mr. HULBERT. I am sorry my effort to help him has not impressed the gentleman. My colleague is quite capable of representing his own district.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. Without objection, the pro forma amendment is withdrawn. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET].

The question being taken, the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

For fees to special-delivery messengers, $2,000,000: Provided, That the full fee of 8 cents shall be paid to the special-delivery messenger employed by the Government.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on that proviso. I would like to have some explanation as to the reason for taking away the discretion of the Postmaster General.

Mr. MADDEN. It has always been understood that all fees for special-delivery letters were to be paid to the messengers, but it was ascertained that during the past year contracts had been let to messenger-service companies in one or two cities in the United States and that they were paid 7 cents for the delivery of each letter, while they employed the boys who ordinarily would have been employed at 8 cents to deliver the letters for 5 cents. It was to prevent the recurrence of that sort of practice that this provision was put in the bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is there any instance, to the knowledge of the gentleman, where the Postmaster General has declined to pay the 8-cent rate where the boys are receiving more than a certain maximum pay?

Mr. MADDEN. No; I think not.

Mr. STAFFORD. I thought the purpose was to restrict the authority of the Postmaster General so that in some districts where the fees of special messengers would be greater than a certain stated amount he would be unable to cut them down and have the revenue fall into the postal revenue.

Mr. MADDEN. It was to prevent the letting of contracts.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

That section 3938 of the Revised Statutes is hereby amended to read as follows:

"All letters of domestic origin which can not be delivered by postmasters shall be sent to the Post Office Department, and such as contain inclosures of value, other than correspondence, shall be recorded. If the sender or addressee can not be identified, such letters shall be held for a period of one year awaiting reclamation. If within one year they have not been claimed, they shall be disposed of as the Postmaster General may direct. All other undeliverable letters shall be disposed of without record and not held for reclamation."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the paragraph. As I read the new language it provides that in order to have the return of letters sent to the Dead Letter Office they must contain valuables. It does not provide for the return of letters where the sender or addressee may be subsequently discovered if the letter does not contain valuables.

Mr. MOON. I think the gentleman is correct.

Mr. STAFFORD. I would like to ask the gentleman a further question. Does the gentleman think that the law should be so changed so as not to provide for the return of letters sent to the Dead Letter Office which, upon being opened, discloses the name of the sender and can be returned?

Mr. MOON. I do not know any better way than to let the Postmaster General dispose of those letters after they have been held a year. It would save a great expense to the department, I am told.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have the paragraph amended along certain lines indicated, but I will not press the point of order, and I withdraw it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Railway Mail Service: For 15 division superintendents, at $3,250 each; 2 assistant superintendents, at $2,350 each; 15 assistant division superintendents, at $2,250 each; 118 chief clerks, at not exceeding $2,100 each; 459 clerks, grade 10, at not exceeding $1,800 each; 1,886 clerks, grade 9, at not exceeding $1,700 each; 549 clerks, grade 8, at not exceeding $1,600 each; 7,876 clerks, grade 7, at not exceeding $1,500 each; 1,003 clerks, grade 6, at not exceeding $1,400 each; 1,892 clerks, grade 5, at not exceeding $1,300 each; 4,493 clerks, grade 4, at not exceeding $1,200 each; 926 clerks, grade 3, at not exceeding $1,100 each; 193 clerks, grade 2, at not exceeding $1,000 each; 3,496 clerks, grade 1, at not exceeding $900 each; in all, $29,725,050: Provided, That clerks assigned as clerks in charge of crews consisting of more than one clerk shall be clerks of grades 5 and 10, inclusive, and may be promoted one grade only after three years' satisfactory and faithful service in such capacity.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, on page 18, line 5, after the word "five" and before the word "ten," to strike out the word "and" and insert the word "to."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 18, line 17, strike out the word "and" between the words "five" and "ten" and insert in lieu thereof the word "to."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For substitutes for clerks on vacation, $193,900.

Mr. VAN DYKE. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to that paragraph; on page 19, line 10, I move to strike out the figures "$193,900" and substitute "$960,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 19, line 10, strike out the figures "$193,900" and insert in lieu thereof the figures "$960,000."

Mr. VAN DYKE. Mr. Chairman, my purpose in offering this amendment is because it is generally supposed by all Members of the House and others that the Government employees are at the present time receiving an annual vacation. This is not the fact, however, because the Postal Department employees, with the exception of a certain number, are receiving a vacation of but 15 days, while all other departments and employees receive 30 days. There are 15,029 employees in the Railway Mail Service who work 8 hours a day 313 days in the year who receive no annual vacation whatever. I do not believe it has been the purpose of Congress in the past to exclude or discriminate against this class of employees. I believe it would be their purpose, if so advised, to vote for sufficient funds to include that number of men in this provision which calls for substitutes for clerks on vacations.

Mr. MOON. Will the gentleman permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. VAN DYKE. Certainly.

Mr. MOON. The $193,900 appropriated in this bill is to pay for substitutes for clerks on vacation as now authorized by law.

Mr. VAN DYKE. I did not know that they differentiated as to what clerks should receive a vacation.

Mr. MOON. No clerk can receive pay or a vacation except those authorized, and this covers all authorized by law. If the gentleman were to have his appropriation increased, there would be no way in which the department could use the money.

Mr. VAN DYKE. I would like to ask the gentleman if he can tell what portion of the railway mail clerks should receive a vacation at the present time as authorized by law? Has there been any differentiation made?

Mr. MOON. Does the gentleman mean how many receive it?

Mr. VAN DYKE. Three thousand eight hundred and thirty-five receive a vacation according to the ruling of the department.

Mr. MOON. And they get the vacation pay.

Mr. VAN DYKE. They are made up mostly of office men, as a rule, and are not the men employed in the railway mail car.

Mr. MOON. Is not this what the gentleman wants, that he wants the law changed so as to give all a vacation?

Mr. VAN DYKE. I want the appropriation raised so that the department will be able to pay substitutes and give all a vacation.

Mr. MOON. The department could not pay it if it had the money.

Mr. VAN DYKE. I am asking for an appropriation sufficiently large at the present time so that it can.

Mr. MOON. But the department can not pay out money without authority of law.

Mr. VAN DYKE. Is there any provision which would prohibit the department from paying out that money if it was appropriated?

Mr. MOON. Certainly. You can not appropriate money without authority of law. There is no authority to appropriate for more clerks than are appropriated for.

Mr. ROUSE. I will say to the gentleman that this is $50,000 more than it was the year before.

Mr. VAN DYKE. But the gentleman has not made it sufficiently clear why the law will not permit of an appropriation of $960,000 so that all of the employees can receive vacations. I have never seen anything in the law that prohibits it.

Mr. FINLEY. The trouble is that there is no law covering a large percentage of the railway mail clerks. The law does not cover them all so that you can grant them that.

Mr. VAN DYKE. What provision allows the department to give 3,835 clerks a vacation at the present time?

Mr. FINLEY. There is specific law granting vacation to those who run six days a week. The clerk that runs on a main line where there are a number of clerks does not work six days a week on the train.

Mr. VAN DYKE. I might reply to the gentleman from South Carolina by saying that the matter of whether a man works eight hours a day for six days in the week or works the sum total of twenty-five hundred and odd hours a year should make no difference in the granting of a vacation. As a matter of fact, it is harder on the man who works for 16 hours one day and does not work the next day.

Mr. FINLEY. I am simply telling the gentleman what the law is as it is on the statute books. The trouble the gentleman encounters is that there is no law to give these clerks who run a certain number of days off and a certain number of days on a vacation with pay.

Mr. VAN DYKE. What law is there to prohibit it? I do not mean just that question, but the law which grants the privilege of appropriating $193,900 also grants the same power to appropriate $960,000, does it not?

Mr. FINLEY. It does not. The gentleman is mistaken. There is a specific law covering those clerks who run six days a week. There is no law covering those who are on a certain number of days and off a certain number of days. So that is the difference. If we appropriated $10,000,000 here, those clerks who work three days a week and are off three days a week would not get a cent of money.

Mr. VAN DYKE. That is the question I asked the chairman of the committee—if there was a specific law prohibiting it.

Mr. FINLEY. There is no law prohibiting it, but you have to have a law authorizing it.

Mr. VAN DYKE. It is the same proposition, as to whether or not the law would authorize the expenditure of that money if it was appropriated.

Mr. FINLEY. It would not.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

For inland transportation of mail by electric and cable cars, $660,000: Provided, That the rate of compensation to be paid per mile shall not exceed the rate now paid to companies performing such service, except that the Postmaster General, in cases where the quantity of mail is large and the number of exchange points numerous, may, in his discretion, authorize payment for closed-pouch service at a rate per mile not to exceed one-third above the rate per mile now paid for closed-pouch service; and for mail cars and apartments carrying the mails, not to exceed the rate of 1 cent per linear foot per car-mile of travel: Provided further, That the rates for electric car service on routes over 20 miles in length outside of cities shall not exceed the rates paid for service on steam railroads: Provided, however, That not to exceed $15,000 of the sum hereby appropriated may be expended, in the discretion of the Postmaster General, where unusual conditions exist or where such service will be more expeditious and efficient and at no greater cost than otherwise, and not to exceed $100,000 of this appropriation may be expended for regulation screen or motor screen wagon service which may be authorized in lieu of electric or cable car service.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. This item relates to the transportation of mail by electric roads, and so forth, and involves in a way the transportation of mails by steam railroads. I call attention to this in the hope that if a rule is reported it will present to the House the propositions involved in this bill in possibly a more intelligent manner than they are in the bill to-day. For instance, on page 35 of the bill there appears section 15—

That the following provision of law be inserted in the bill making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, and for other purposes, as part of the item "for inland transportation by railroad routes."

Provided, That when, during the weighing period—

And so forth.

Mr. Chairman, the bill contains, on page 17, an item for inland transportation of mail by railroad routes, and on page 35 occurs this item that a certain provision of law—and it is not a law—shall be inserted in the bill making appropriations at a certain place, but that is not where they insert it. I hope if a rule is brought in for the consideration of these matters that the Committee on Rules, or whoever prepares it, will so word it that it will authorize these propositions to be put in the bill where they belong. To insert an item in a bill with an appropriation and then 20 pages later insert an item that "the following provision of law" be inserted as a part of the item, which is 20 pages ahead of it, shows that some one fell down. I do not know who it was. If this bill should pass in the shape in which it is now, there would be a provision in it that there should be inserted in the bill—and after it is a law it is no longer a bill—as a part of an item for inland transportation by railroads, legislation 20 pages away from it in the bill.

Mr. MOON. But the legislation 20 pages away is not subject to a point of order and this is.

Mr. MANN. Oh, there is absolutely no distinction as to the point of order, whether it is in one place or another.

Mr. MOON. Yes; there is.

Mr. MANN. I know how it occurs. The department in making its estimate or request asked to have this item inserted as a part of the item for inland transportation by railroad routes, and whoever made up the bill, instead of inserting it in that place, took the caption and all and inserted it as a section. It was a direction as to where the item should be inserted, but instead of following the direction they but the direction in as a part of the bill.

Mr. MOON. Oh, well, the gentleman may be correct about that——

Mr. MANN. I know I am.

Mr. MOON. But that is a matter we will attend to when we get to it. That is 20 pages off.

Mr. MANN. There is no way of attending to it unless it is provided for in the rule.

Mr. MOON. We will attend to it.

Mr. MANN. Well, I do not know whether—certainly it would not have been attended to unless attention had been called to it.

Mr. MOON. The gentleman may be correct about that and may be incorrect.

Mr. MANN. That is the reason I am calling attention to it, so if a rule comes in making this in order, make it in order as a part of the item, "inland transportation of mail," instead of saying you insert it somewhere else as a provision of law as a part of an item which is 20 pages away from it.

Mr. MOON. I assume the Committee on Rules will have it right if it is stricken out when reached on a point of order.

Mr. MANN. I do not assume that the Committee on Rules or anybody else is going to correct all errors unless their attention is called to them.

Mr. MOON. The gentleman may be right about that, as far as that is concerned.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, I desire just to state to the committee that it is my recollection that the committee considered this proposed legislation in connection with the item for transportation of inland routes and we supposed that we had it in the right place. This must have been a mistake in making up the bill by the Clerk.

Mr. MOON. No, I think the gentleman is mistaken about that. The intention was to put it exactly where it is, but we expect to attend to it just the way we desire when it is reached.

Mr. STEENERSON. Is it not a fact that the committee considered this in connection with the item in the bill——

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I insist we get along with the bill and not talk about something that is 20 pages away.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Minnesota says they put this item in the right place in the bill. It is connected with the item under consideration or I would not have presumed to discuss it. It is not the only place in the bill, as long as they desire to have their attention called to it, but section 13, on page 34, provides—

That the following be added as a proviso to the item "Inland transportation by railroad routes"—

And so forth, though it is nearly 20 pages away from the item. Section 16 provides—

That the following proviso be added to the item "Inland transportation by railroad routes" in the Post Office appropriation bill for the fiscal year 1917—

And so forth, though that is 20 pages from the item.

Section 17 does not cover that, but it has another bad fault in it. There are a number of other cases of that kind in the bill, made up with a pair of shears and a paste pot, without the necessary use of gray matter. [Laughter.]

Mr. MOON. We will attend to that when we reach it, and will not anticipate any trouble in this matter.

Mr. MANN. Anticipate it? I am calling attention to it some weeks after it should have been attended to. This bill was reported January 31, nearly a month ago.

Mr. MOON. The gentleman once voted for these sections exactly as they are.

Mr. MANN. It was reported exactly as they are—absolutely erroneously reported. No one would know what they meant if the bill should be passed without changing the law.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

For payment of limited indemnity for the loss of pieces of domestic registered matter, insured, and collect-on-delivery mail, $200,000.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend, page 22, line 12, by inserting, after the word "the" and before the word "loss," the words "injury or," so as to make the section read:

For payment of limited indemnity for the injury or loss of pieces of domestic registered matter—

And so forth.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 22, line 12, after the word "the" and before the word "loss," insert the words "injury or."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Office of the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General: For stationery for the Postal Service, including blanks, books, printed and engraved matter, binding and carbon paper and other miscellaneous items for the money-order and registry systems; also the preparation, publication, and free distribution by postmasters to the public of pamphlet containing general postal information, $260,000.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, what is intended here by "free distribution by postmasters to the public of pamphlets containing general postal information"; to start a newspaper?

Mr. MOON. Will the gentleman please repeat what he said, if he is speaking to me?

Mr. MANN. This language in the bill, I believe, is unusual and new in reference to free distribution by postmasters to the public of a pamphlet containing general postal information. Has that been provided for heretofore?

Mr. MANN. Page 23, at the top.

Mr. MOON. I do not think so.

Mr. MANN. That is a very large increase of appropriation. Last year it was $165,000, and it is now $260,000. This would authorize the publication of a post-office newspaper.

Mr. MOON. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Is that the intention, does the gentleman know?

Mr. MOON. I think the department just asked for that additional sum for the purpose of extending that work. That is my recollection about it.

Mr. FINLEY. This is part of it, as I understand, that the parcel post is comparatively new to a great many people and is for the purpose of giving information about that and about other matters pertaining to the Postal Service. It has not been of such urgent necessity heretofore. I think that is it.

Mr. MANN. I thought we were doing that work, I do not know under what authorization.

Mr. FINLEY. They wanted specific authority, I understand.

Mr. MANN. It is not intended to publish a periodical——

Mr. FINLEY. No, no.

Mr. MANN. Or a magazine, like the Reclamation Service illegally does?

Mr. FINLEY. Nothing of that sort, it is my understanding.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn.

There was no objection.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, before we pass on this question I call the attention of the gentleman from Illinois to the real explanation of this matter, as contained on page 206. It says:

That includes the item "For blanks, books, and printed matter of urgent or special character, intaglio seals, and other miscellaneous items of immediate necessity for the registry system," and the item "For blanks, blank books, printed and engraved matter, binding and carbon paper for the money-order service."

In all, $260,000. That is the explanation of the department.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the purchase, exchange, and repair of typewriting machines, envelope-opening machines, and computing machines, copying presses, numbering machines, time recorders, and miscellaneous articles purchased and furnished directly to the Postal Service, $135,000.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the paragraph. What does this provision for the purchase of time recorders refer to? I see this item carries, for the first time, I believe, an appropriation for the purchase of time recorders for the use of the various post offices. What are those used for, may I ask?

Mr. MOON. Maybe they are for recording the time when the clerks come and go.

Mr. MANN. They have had that class of time recorders in the office for a long time.

Mr. MOON. The gentleman from South Carolina advises me they are for recording the first-class mail. We will find a statement of the department here in a moment.

Mr. MANN. I notice one of the gentlemen the other day inserted in the RECORD a very strong protest from that portion of the post-office clerks connected with the American Federation of Labor in reference to something of this kind. I do not know that it referred to time recorders.

Mr. MOON. Here is what Mr. Blakslee says about it:

Time recorders heretofore purchased from the appropriation for the City Delivery Service, incidental expenses, are now put under this specific appropriation for office appliances. In addition to that I think all the members of the committee have had information from local postmasters relative to the necessity for adding machines and typewriters in their various offices, and we want to reduce the unit of measurement whereby typewriting and adding machines are installed in post offices. We require a certain number of money-order transactions per year before an adding machine is granted to an office, and we want to reduce that number slightly. We also require a certain number of money-order transactions per year before a typewriter is issued to an office, and we want to reduce this unit of measurement. The effect of these reductions will be an increase in the number of typewriters and adding machines put into the service.

Mr. MANN. I am satisfied with the gentleman's statement. I withdraw the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois withdraws the point of order and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For rental and purchase of canceling machines, including cost of power in rented buildings, motors, repairs to motors, and miscellaneous expenses of installation and operation, $250,000.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. In times past we have had a great deal of discussion here in reference to these canceling machines. I notice the appropriation proposed now is $75,000 less than was carried in the bill as it passed the House last year. What is the reason for that?

Mr. MOON. Well, the committee thought that reduction might be made because of an unexpended balance, but the department does not agree with it. I will have this letter on that subject read by the Clerk, if it is desired.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

OFFICE OF THE POSTMASTER GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., February 12, 1916.

Hon. JOHN A. MOON,
Chairman House Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. MOON: My attention has been called to the report of the committee recommending a reduction of $50,000 in the item of purchase and rental of canceling machines in the Post Office appropriation bill now pending.

It is urgently recommended that this appropriation be increased to $300,000, as originally requested by the department, for the reason that the annual rental of machines now amounts to more than $250,000. The appropriation as it now stands would not cover the outlay for rental, and would leave no margin for operation of Government-owned machines already in the service and other similar items of expense. More important still, it would leave no margin to the department for the purchase of machines to equip the service at the end of the present rental contract period.

For many years the Post Office Department has been compelled to pay an exorbitant rental for canceling machines. Under present contracts we can buy machines of the different grades required for approximately the cost of rental for two years. At the same time many of these machines have lasted for 20 years or longer, with renewals of necessary parts from time to time. From the experience of the department with Government-owned machines it is certain that a very considerable saving can be effected by the purchase of all the canceling machines required for use in the Postal Service.

Under the policy adopted by the department a few years ago the margin left over after the necessary expenditures for rental and other items has been used to buy machines to equip the service on and after July 1, 1917, which is the end of the present rental-contract period. To reduce the appropriation $50,000, as proposed, would seriously interfere with the carrying out of this policy, and would compel the department in part to continue the present wasteful and objectionable rental-contract system.

Very truly, yours,

DANIEL C. ROPER,
Acting Postmaster General.

Mr. MOON. The appropriation for the last fiscal year, as I recollect, was $300,000.

Mr. MANN. The appropriation carried in the bill last year as it passed the House was $325,000.

Mr. MOON. The previous one, that became the law, was $300,000. Now, the unexpended balance of last year, as shown by the RECORD, was $48,650, and the committee thought they might get along with $250,000.

Mr. MANN. Now, Mr. Chairman, I think the committee has made a grave mistake in reference to this.

Mr. MOON. So it seems the department thinks.

Mr. MANN. There has been a controversy going on in this House for a good many years in reference to these canceling machines. We started out, I think, paying four or five hundred dollars a year rent for the machines. I do not know but that it was more than that—machines that probably did not cost that much to construct. Of course the persons from whom we rented maintained the machines and made the repairs. Originally there were only a few of them, but canceling machines are now used in all places where they have a large amount of first-class mail to cancel. We own a few machines, but we have a large number of machines under lease. The lease, I believe, expires on a certain considerable number of these machines on the 30th day of June next, a year from now—not this June, but a year from now. At the time this appropriation ends the lease expires. The lease expires with the fiscal year for which this appropriation is made.

Now, we have not made a sufficient appropriation, according to the Post Office Department, to more than pay the rental on the machines that we have rented. They say we have not enough to operate the machines we now own, but if we come up to the first day of July, 1917, in operating these leased machines, with no money at all to buy new machines, we have got to renew the leases on the terms of the men who own the machines. We pay, so the Post Office Department says, in leases in two years the cost of a machine that ought to last from 10 to 20 years. And yet we have been carrying for years a little extra, so that at the end of the fiscal year the department might use what was left over in the way of a balance to purchase machines so that the Government would own some of the machines, and we are supposed to cut that all out in the very year when it becomes most important. We could probably buy these machines and operate them by the Government and save $100,000 a year without any trouble at all.

Of course, we have to pay the rental on the machines that we have leased until July 1, 1917, and unless the committee is willing to make some increase in the appropriation we shall be absolutely in the hands and control of these men. I do not blame them. They want to get all they can out of the leasing of the machines rather than out of the selling of them.

I remember we were told here time and time again that we could not buy the machines, that they were only for lease; and we put provisions in the bill in years past authorizing the department to purchase the machines. We were told that we could only lease the machines at these exorbitant rates, while the department said as to these leases, "We will buy the machines." There was no trouble in buying them. There was competition, and we own some of the machines, although we will not be able to operate them with this limited appropriation. Certainly when the lease expires we ought to be in a position to protect ourselves from the exorbitant charges of these gentlemen who wish to lease the machines rather than to sell them.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, the last appropriation for this purpose was for $300,000. The unexpended balance was about $48,000. The committee felt that if we could get along with $50,000 less than theretofore it would be well that we do it, and the unexpended balance indicated that that could be done. But an explanation has been made of this matter by the Postmaster General since, and I feel sure that the explanation made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] as to the expiration of these leases is well worth the consideration of the House. I move to strike out $250,000 and insert $300,000, in line 22, page 25.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

Page 25, line 22, strike out "$250,000" and insert "$300,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For compensation to labor employed in the equipment shops at Washington, D. C., $155,000.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I would like say to the gentleman in charge of the bill [Mr. MOON] and to the distinguished gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] that my recollection is that it has been customary, while we hold sessions on Washington's Birthday, to pay some slight tribute by adjourning a few minutes earlier on that day than ordinarily. I think it is a wise custom to pursue, especially since we have got to this part in the bill when we are facing the rural service and the star route service. I hope the gentleman will now move to rise. It is now almost 5 o'clock.

Mr. MOON. Will the gentleman let the Clerk read until he reaches the bottom of the page? Then we will rise.

Mr. MANN. We have read down to the star-route service.

Mr. MOON. Well, we can take that up later. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. RAINEY, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 10484, the Post Office appropriation bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed with amendments joint resolution of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. LAZARO, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled joint resolution of the following title, when the Speaker signed the same:

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HELVERING] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the subject of the Colombian treaty. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, February 23, 1916, at 12 o'clock noon.

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, February 23, 1916.

(Legislative day of Monday, February 21, 1916.)

The Senate reassembled at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

The Vice President being absent, the President pro tempore took the chair.

DEVELOPMENT OF WATER POWER.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3331) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of dams across navigable waters," approved June 21, 1906, as amended by the act approved June 23, 1910, and to provide for the improvement and development of waterways for the uses of interstate and foreign commerce.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Utah suggests the absence of a quorum. Let the Secretary call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Harding	Overman	Smith, S. C.
Bankhead	Hollis	Page	Smoot
Beckham	Hughes	Pittman	Sterling
Brandegee	Husting	Poindexter	Stone
Catron	James	Pomerene	Sutherland
Chilton	Jones	Robinson	Swanson
Clapp	Kenyon	Saulsbury	Tillman
Clarke, Ark.	Kern	Shafroth	Vardaman
Colt	Lodge	Sheppard	Walsh
Cummins	McLean	Sherman	Warren
Curtis	Martin, Va.	Shields	Williams
Dillingham	Martine, N. J.	Simmons	Works
du Pont	Nelson	Smith, Ariz.
Fletcher	Norris	Smith, Ga.
Gronna	Oliver	Smith, Mich.

Mr. CHILTON. My colleague [Mr. GOFF] is absent on account of illness. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I desire to state for the day the absence of the senior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN], who is absent on official business.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I desire to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. THOMAS] on account of illness.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I wish to announce the absence of the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD], who is detained from the Senate on important public business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JAMES in the chair). Fifty-seven Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The pending amendment is the one offered by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH].

Mr. STONE. I ask the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] in charge of the bill before the Senate to permit me to make a request of the Senate. It will take but a moment.

Mr. SHIELDS. I yield for that purpose.

ARMING OF MERCHANT VESSELS.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, some days ago I asked leave of the Senate, which was granted, to print certain extracts from Moore's Digest of International Law which related especially to the declaration of Paris, which declaration concerns privateers. I thought that important, and it is important at this time; also that a certain paper written by Mr. Higgins and printed in the American Law Journal might also be printed in that document.

That was agreed to by the Senate, and it has been prepared or set up by the Printing Office. But I have asked that office to withhold it for the time being that I might make a request this morning that to that document, which is Senate Document 332, there might be added an extract from Moore's Digest of International Law relating to the subject and under the headline of "Arming of merchant vessels," and also to print as a part of that document an article by Dr. George Schramm, counselor of the German Imperial Navy Department, relating to the same subject; also a document written by W. J. M. von Eysinga, professor in Leiden University, which is a statement of the views of this author on the same subject from the standpoint of the author.

Also, Mr. President, to add to the same document certain matter which was printed as an appendix to a speech delivered by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] on the 18th of the present month, or so much thereof as is not covered in the documents preceding which I have asked to have printed.

I should like to have these matters printed in this document for the convenient use of Senators considering what is an important matter at this time.

Also, I ask leave to include in the same document a paper written by Col. George Harvey, and which appears in the North American Review of May, 1915, entitled "The Government and the war." While that does not relate directly to the question of the arming of merchant vessels, it does very intimately concern our relations and our duty as a Nation to acute subjects that are of immediate and profound interest.

Mr. LODGE. Is that an article by Mr. Harvey?

Mr. STONE. It is. It is a matter of immediate interest, I say, to the questions concerning our relations to foreign Governments, and I think it would be of great interest and value to Senators who will take occasion to read the matter which I am asking to have printed as a Senate document.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Missouri? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

DEVELOPMENT OF WATER POWER.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3331) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of dams across navigable waters," approved June 21, 1906, as amended by the act approved June 23, 1910, and to provide for the improvement and development of waterways for the uses of interstate and foreign commerce.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the pending amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 6, line 22, the junior Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] proposes to strike out the words "based upon its value as land."

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I wish to call attention to the purport of the amendment which is proposed by the Senator from Montana. It is in subdivision (f) of the second section of the bill. The provision I will read in full, so as to get the connection of the amendment:

That such grantee—

That is, the company which proposes to construct the improvement in the river for navigation—

in the construction, maintenance, and operation of such dam or diversion structure and accessory works may, with the authority of the Secretary of War, occupy and use, to the extent necessary for the project, any lands of the United States, including the public lands; and any part of the public lands may, on certification by the Secretary of War that the same is required for navigation purposes, be withdrawn by the President for said purpose as provided in the act entitled "An act to authorize the President of the United States to make withdrawal of public lands in certain cases, approved June 25, 1910"; and for any land of the United States so used and occupied the grantee shall pay to the United States such reasonable charges based upon upon its value as land as may be fixed by the Secretary of War; and in fixing such charges consideration shall be taken of the benefits accruing from the use and occupation of such lands to the interests of navigation, as well as to the business of said grantee.

The amendment of the Senator from Montana is to strike out the words "based upon its value as land," in the twenty-second line of the sixth page of the bill. The Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] on Monday afternoon stated that that language was added and placed in the bill for a purpose; that it is was a compromise provision, and he thought it should stay.

There has been, as you know, a tendency manifested by the officers of the Interior Department for the past 20 years to claim the water which flows in both navigable and nonnavigable streams as something in which the United States has an interest, and they therefore seek to impose a charge of some kind for the water that is in the stream and upon the powers that are generated thereby. That would not be the case in an ordinary condemnation proceeding against a private individual. They could not impose any such restriction, royalty, or charge upon a company that might want to build a water-power plant.

It is on that account that the committee considered whether the Government should include a water value or charge for the lands that might be needed in the improvement of a river. Personally, I do not think the Government ought to get any amount whatever, because the work means the improving of the river. If the Government undertook that work, of course it would take its own land without cost. Improvement for navigation is the primary purpose of the construction under the bill. The Government should not hamper a contractor who might undertake to build a dam primarily for purposes of navigation. To load down the enterprise with charges because the Government happened to have some public land near the proposed site seems to me a policy that will not enlist the cooperation of those persons who desire to construct works of navigation at their own expense and turn them over to the Government.

Mr. President, it seems to me when we consider that under this bill not one dollar is to be expended by the Government, although the rivers are to be improved for navigation and the person undertaking the work receives simply a surplus of the waters, utilizing that which is now going to waste, and subjecting him to a charge imposed by the Secretary of War, without limitation, is a policy that will impair the very operation of the act itself. No man is going to undertake a work of that kind under those circumstances. That is one of the reasons why the leasing system has proved a failure wherever the Government has attempted it on its own account.

Mr. President, this is a measure that may bring to the United States Government in savings millions and millions of dollars. It takes the place to some extent of the rivers and harbors appropriations. Every one of the projects that is improved is going to be primarily for the benefit of the Government in the navigation of the stream.

Now, to cripple the proposed undertakings by declaring that we will make a charge and that that charge is not for the value of the land taken, but is in some way connected with the water that flows in the stream, and that therefore we should have a high charge for the purpose of getting a revenue from this source when the very purpose and object is to get a large improvement for the Government without any expense whatever—upon what ground can the Government base its right to any such contention? No one claims that the waters of the navigable streams belong to the United States Government. The Government has no ownership whatever in those streams; the State has ownership of the waters, and the National Government under the interstate-commerce clause of the Constitution is given the right to prevent obstructions to navigation—has a check upon the structures that may be authorized by the State governments. That being the case, upon what ground can the Government insist that there should be an element of charge imposed upon the owners or upon those who attempt to erect these structures in behalf of the Government?

It seems to me this bill goes far beyond a proper purpose in fixing any charge whatever upon public lands that may lie along a river where an improvement of the kind is desired by the Government. But to say that that land shall be appraised for all possible values that it may have to a particular enterprise is going far beyond the provisions that any measure should contain.

Mr. President, the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] said that in condemnation suits a jury should take into consideration any use to which the land might be put. The contention which I made was that for all uses in the condemnation of land the value should be fixed. I do not see that there is much difference between us, although some of the decisions which I read were to that effect, and used the words "all purposes," and those which he read used in some instances the words "all purposes" and in other instances the words "any purpose."

Mr. President, it is not what the land would be worth to a company that might desire to construct one of these improvements in a river. No court has held that that should be estimated in fixing the value of the land. It can not take into consideration the benefits which that company might get; that is one of the elements that can not be taken into consideration. The value is the market value; and the market value takes into consideration whether there is any or a limited demand whatever for that land. On that account it seems to me that the contention which I make is correct, and that is that this land, if charged for, should be charged for as land only, and that under no circumstances should it be charged for upon a basis of benefit it might be to the company that would construct the dam.

Mr. President, what does this proposition do? It hampers development under the bill. These companies are not going on any of these navigable streams to improve navigation merely for fun; they are not going to do it unless they get a remuneration for it. If you restrict too much the remuneration which they should get, you are not going to get the work undertaken at all. If you are going to put into the hands of the Secretary of War the right to charge so much per horsepower, that means that in all probability but few of these enterprises will be attempted. It might be that in some favored locality where there might be a particularly great demand for power a company would take the risk anyway; but it must be remembered that the value of this land is not left to a jury; that it is not left to a commission; but that it is left to the Secretary of War—the opposite party—and that his finding is conclusive; there is no appeal from it. When you fix a rule as to what the Secretary of War shall charge and leave it absolutely in his power to fix that charge, without consulting the wishes of the man who wants to buy it, nor consulting a jury, nor consulting commissioners, you can readily see that you will not get the improvements under this bill that are desired.

Mr. President, in the public-land States we see the hardship of any attempt to impose a leasing system upon us; but the people of the original States do not seem to realize that condition to the extent at least that we do. They do not have the concrete examples before them.

The Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] has handed me a statement, which, he says, is directly applicable to what I have said, and I will read it. It is from the Dunbar case and states that in the case of the United States v. Chandler-Dunbar Co., 229 U. S., the Supreme Court held that land necessary and taken for the improvement of navigation should be valued as land and for what it is worth as land, and not what it might be worth for other purposes.

Mr. President, when this committee has followed that identical language, the language which the Supreme Court of the United States has used in a similar case when lands were necessary to be taken for the improvement of navigation, it seems to me that the action of the committee is eminently proper. To attempt to put upon a stream in which the Government does not own a drop of water charges upon horsepower that might be generated therefrom is nothing but the exercise of an arbitrary power which should not be sanctioned by the Congress of the United States.

Mr. President, suppose that in one of the Eastern States the proposition was advanced that the Federal Government should have some kind of right to impose a tax upon water power generated there. I ask would it not seem strange to Senators from those States? If there was a stream in which the Federal Government had no ownership whatever, and consequently had no right to dictate as to it, would it not be usurpation for the Federal Government to say "We want a part of this power," or "We want a royalty based on the power that you may generate in this enterprise," especially when the person undertaking the work is not coming to the Federal Government for the purpose of an appropriation, is not coming to the Federal Government for anything except that which is for the benefit of the Federal Government, namely, making the stream navigable, so that under the interstate-commerce law we may have better facilities for transporting our goods to market?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I should like to ask the Senator from Colorado whether he favors bestowing valuable grants and privileges upon corporations to be used for profit without reserving any compensation to the city or the county or the State or the Nation which gives them?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Well, Mr. President, my view is this: Wherever I have had the power to exercise any influence whatever over legislation, I have always wanted and I want now strict public-utility commissions, for the purpose of preventing corporations from exacting from the people any larger returns than are absolutely necessary, and thereby making any franchise that might be granted of no greater value than that arising from the reasonable remuneration to which the corporation is entitled. In the State of Colorado we have such a commission. I endeavored in the best way possible to bring it about, and I believe that it is to the best interest of the people that there should be such bodies.

Of course, when there were no utility commissions there grew up an abuse of power. The Interstate Commerce Commission was to a large extent created for the purpose of preventing those abuses. Nearly every State in the Union now has utility commissions, and consequently, with the power of regulation being in the State over any corporation that might attempt to secure a franchise or to make money out of a franchise, there is a complete remedy. Inasmuch as the people of the States are to be affected by these charges, they are the ones who should regulate and who should control them.

Mr. President, I am fully aware—and the Senator from Nebraska no doubt is also—that whenever you make a charge of any kind upon a company which adds to the yearly amount of their expenses, you are going to have that reflected in the charge which they get out of the people; you are going to find that they will charge not only the amount which they pay to the Government, but they are going to multiply it two, or three, or four times when it is finally paid by the consumer, so that it is bad economics, in my judgment, to impose upon the public lands of the National Government any charge except such reasonable charge as may be necessary.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I think the Senator has failed to answer the question. The point I am making is this: The argument which the Senator makes now was made years ago, and it was made in justification of making absolute gifts of public property to private corporations without any compensation; but that day has gone. In our cities and in our States the people have come to the conviction that when great grants are to be bestowed on private corporations adequate compensation should be provided for. We have seen the development of that idea. For instance, in our cities the street-car companies are compelled to divide their profits with the municipalities; and I see no reason why, when the Government of the United States unquestionably possesses these great resources and proposes to open them up to private corporations in the different parts of the country, it should not impose, for the benefit of the people, a reasonable charge to be paid into the Public Treasury.

It seems to me that the position taken by the Senator that the charge may be carried on to those who use the facilities is not one which should deter the Government from enacting it. These companies are likely to lay that charge on the people whether or not the Government receives the benefit of it. The only sure way to see that the people derive an immediate benefit from the bestowal of such grants is to provide in the bill that the beneficiaries shall pay reasonable compensation for what they get, and then we know that the people will get some return.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, the difference between the Senator and myself is this: I believe in paying for these public lands what they are worth; I am willing to let a commission or a jury fix the amount which the lands are worth; but I do not believe that the United States Government should undertake to lay and collect a royalty when the companies which undertake to develop these enterprises pay for what the land is worth. When they do that, it seems to me they have done all that should be asked of them. When you attempt to impose on behalf of the United States Government conditions and terms, you are going beyond the power of the United States with relation to the matter.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. When this land shall have been paid for the Federal Government will have nothing to do with it any more. The Government will then be out of the scheme, and when the Government is entirely out of it you will find that the development will go on because the Government will not have power to lay an embargo on the right of the State to distribute the power generated by that State agency. When the land is purchased according to its proper value the necessity for the Senator's amendment passes away.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I thank the Senator for his suggestion.

Now I want, if I can have the attention of the Senator from Nebraska, to attempt to analyze what is in this bill and to show what the object of the proposed amendment is.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, right there will the Senator allow me to make a suggestion?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes, sir.

Mr. JONES. When the conditions referred to by the Senator from Nebraska existed we did not have many public service commissions exercising the powers which they exercise now.

Mr. SHAFROTH. That is true. The evil grew up out of the fact that we did not have such public utility commissions. I want to ask the Senator whether he can not see the injustice of the situation? Where the development companies are willing to pay for the land, where those who may want to construct the improvement are willing to let a jury or a commission assess its value and to determine the fair value for which it would sell in the market, to exact anything more would be, it seems to me, simply to play the dog in the manger.

There is no right of eminent domain against the United States Government. Some authorities say the right of eminent domain as against the General Government does exist in the States, and it may be that there are a number of decisions that sanction that doctrine; but, Mr. President, there can be practically no right of eminent domain exercised as against the United States Government. Whenever a private individual starts a suit against the Government he knows that he can never succeed in it, except at the expenditure of such an enormous amount as to make his enterprise unprofitable. Therefore such right of eminent domain in practical effect does not exist. Now, what would the Senator think if no right of eminent domain could be exercised in behalf of a railroad company? Suppose a railroad company, after filing its charter and a map of its lines, goes out and tries to get the land needed for its tracks, and a farmer along the right of way—and the Government with relation to its land is really the private owner of the land, just as is the farmer in relation to his land—should say, "I will not let this railroad go through unless the railroad will give me a royalty on every ton that passes over its lines, or unless it will give me a dividend out of its earnings," I should like to know whether there is any justice in that and whether, if that should occur, the people universally would not say that it was a "holdup"?

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. NORRIS. I want to ask the Senator if he does not think there is a difference between an individual having the authority to make such a demand, who would only make a private profit out of it, and the Government exercising that right in behalf of all the people? The Government is the trustee for the people in this case.

Mr. SHAFROTH. No; because the power of this Government is a power under delegated authority. If it is desired to prescribe the terms upon which a corporation can operate in a State, it must be done by the State law. The people of the State are the ones who are interested; they have got to pay the toll. The theory that the States are not capable of attending to their own affairs is absolutely preposterous. They are more careful in respect to the manner in which grants shall be given than are the bodies composing the Congress of the United States.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield further to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. NORRIS. As I understood the Senator, he was using the case of an individual to illustrate what the Government ought to do. The Senator referred to the States and their authority; but he called attention to the fact, as I believe it to be, that there is a difference between an individual exercising what the Senator calls an "arbitrary right" and the Government exercising such a right. If there were no right of eminent domain and the individual landowner should say to the railroad company, "You can not build your railroad or make the improvement on my land, unless you do so-and-so," the only object of the individual having that right, if he possessed it, would be to hold up corporations and public-utility services trying to develop the country for the purpose of his own private gain; but if the Government exercises such an arbitrary right, as those of us who do not agree with the Senator believe it ought to exercise, it is acting in behalf of and as trustee for all the people whose land is being taken by the private corporation.

Mr. SHAFROTH. The trouble with the Senator's position is that when the United States Government owns land, it owns it as a proprietor. It has no municipal jurisdiction or sovereignty in a State; and if there is one thing that is recognized above another, it is that the State has an inherent power of sovereignty to tax every piece of land within its boundaries.

Mr. NORRIS. But still the Senator, as I understand, does not quite grasp the question that I have asked.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Why, I do.

Mr. NORRIS. He has used, as an illustration here, an individual. He says the Government is acting arbitrarily, because it happens to own some land upon which a private corporation wants to build a dam, and by virtue of its ownership in its arbitrary right it says, "You can not have that land unless you will do so-and-so." Now, to illustrate that the Government ought not to exercise such a right, the Senator says, "Suppose an individual undertook to do that, and prevented improvement."

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. The question that I want the Senator to meet is this: Does he not realize that there is a difference between an individual trying to do that for his own individual, private gain and the Government trying to do that in order that it may regulate a public utility, and thus protect the rights of all the people, for whom the Government is the trustee?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I want to carry that illustration a little further and see whether the Senator would agree that the man would have a right to hold up a railroad company going through his farm. Suppose the farmer should say: "No, sir; you can not go through this land unless you put into the Treasury of the United States 3 per cent on your gross earnings." I should like to know whether anybody would sanction the right of an owner of property to make any such exactions and demands and thus defeat a public enterprise.

Mr. NORRIS. The difficulty with the Senator's question—and for that reason it is not a parallel, in my judgment—is that the individual does not represent and can not represent all of the people, while the Government can. If you gave to an individual the right to prevent any improvement or any use in the way of eminent domain of his property, it would necessarily give him the right to hold up these improvements for his private gain.

Mr. SHAFROTH. No; but, suppose he says that it shall be paid into the State treasury, or into the county treasury, or into the National Treasury, should that affect the right of a corporation to go through there?

Mr. NORRIS. But he is not the representative of the State treasury, or the county treasury, or the National Treasury. He is not the trustee. Somebody has to act for all the people, and, under our form of Government, it is those who represent the Government itself.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, the United States, as a proprietor of lands, is in the identical condition as an individual proprietor, except that you can not tax the lands of the United States and you practically have no right of eminent domain; and, consequently, when you vest in an officer of the Government the power, practically, to put on charges that are exorbitant you are not doing the fair thing, it seems to me. If you want to leave this to a jury, all right and good. If you want to leave it to a commission or a court, all right and good. We do not ask in this bill that the lands be given for nothing, and we do not want any corporations in our State to get the lands for nothing. We want them to pay what the land is worth, but we do not want an indefinite statement giving the Secretary of War or any other individual—I care not who he may be—the power, without reference to the courts or without reference to a jury or without reference to a commission, to say, "We will impose this as a charge upon water," when the Federal Government does not own the water any more than I do.

Mr. HITCHCOCK and Mr. WALSH addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I want to ask the Senator whether or not the Government of the United States, on a navigable stream upon which it owns adjacent lands, now has the power to construct a dam and develop a water power on that site?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Oh, yes; I think so. I believe it would have to get the sanction of the State government, however.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It is doing that very thing on these irrigation projects.

Mr. SHAFROTH. But it is no doubt getting the cooperation of the State government. My understanding as to the right of the National Government in the flowing navigable streams of the United States is that it is simply a right to prevent obstruction, that is all; and that is sanctioned by the interstate-commerce clause of the Federal Constitution.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I will ask the Senator to follow me: If the Government of the United States, in the use of its own lands and in the control of navigable streams, has the power to construct a dam and develop a water power, which it is now doing, as the Senator knows, on certain irrigation projects——

Mr. SHAFROTH. Not on navigable streams, though.

Mr. HITCHCOCK (continuing). And sell the electric current or the water power at a large profit; if it transfers that power to a private corporation, why should it not exact a reasonable compensation for it? The Senator believes that if it sells its lands it should exact a reasonable compensation.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Certainly.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Why, then, should it not exact a reasonable compensation when it transfers to a private corporation this very highly profitable opportunity?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Simply because it does not own the water; that is the reason. The Government has no more right to sell something that it does not own than I have a right to sell the water in the Mississippi River. That is the reason, and the distinction is plain and clear.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I want to say just a word, and then I will yield to the Senator from Montana. I am of the opinion that the United States Government has a right to construct these power plants only for a governmental purpose, and that governmental purpose is to improve navigation, and consequently that it has not the right to operate those plants for the other purpose. But suppose——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Hold on; I desire to correct the Senator there.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Except incidentally.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator knows that the Government of the United States is building dams for irrigation purposes.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Not on navigable streams.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator knows that it is developing water power there and that it is selling electric current at the present time.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Oh, if nobody objects to it, of course it can do those things.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Now, then, I ask the Senator this question: Should the Government transfer to a private corporation, operated for profit, this very valuable right practically for nothing, simply upon the payment of $1.25 an acre, or interest on $1.25 an acre, which is a mere trifle and is nothing at all? Why should this great and valuable right of the people of the United States be given away?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Oh, Mr. President, it is not given away; and instead of the United States attempting to do it, the State might attempt to do it with some degree of reason. But if the Senator is correct in saying that the United States, when it does not own the water—and the Supreme Court has decided time and time again that it does not own the water—can impose a royalty on the flow of water which does not belong to it, it seems to me you might impose any condition that would prevent an enterprise from going on, by royalties or high rates of some kind.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator knows that under the circumstances I have mentioned the State can not do it. The Government controls the land. The stream is a navigable stream, and the State has neither the land nor the jurisdiction to develop and transfer a water power.

Mr. SHAFROTH. It has jurisdiction over the water. It may be that because the Government of the United States has undertaken a policy of not disposing of its lands it is in a position where the State can not enforce it against the National Government; but as a matter of fact, the United States Government owns these lands and should own them as a proprietor only, and consequently the jurisdiction of the State ought to be in control of the situation, irrespective of what the National Government might desire.

I want to say to the Senator that in the decision in the case of Kansas against Colorado, Mr. Justice Brewer made this inquiry: "Where is the authority of the National Government to construct these irrigation works?" And said he did not find it in the Constitution. Mr. President, nobody has brought up the constitutionality of that, because nobody seems to be interested; or, if they are interested, not to a sufficient extent. The States will not bring it up, because they get some benefits from the construction of these dams in the States; but Mr. Justice Brewer, who wrote the opinion in the case of Kansas against Colorado, made the assertion that he could find no authority in the United States Government to undertake the construction of irrigation plants.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WALSH. Will the Senator tell us what his view about the matter is?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Oh, my view of the matter is that the United States Government should exercise its right.

Mr. WALSH. But the question is as to whether it has the right to carry on these irrigation projects.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I do not pretend to say. I say that when a Supreme Court justice makes that statement, it is entitled to very great weight; and strictly speaking, under a close construction of the Constitution, it seems to me it has not that right; but, of course, as a matter of fact, if no one protests against it, the question is not going to be raised.

Mr. WALSH. But that is aside from the line of argument the Senator was pursuing, and I should like to come back to it. The Senator was arguing—and I want to follow his line of argument—that the Government ought to sell lands such as those that we are now considering. Does the Senator understand that the bill itself does not contemplate that those lands are going to be sold, but that they are going to be leased only for a period of 50 years?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Oh, that may be. I do not know whether that is true or not. I hope this will not end in a leasing bill; and still, at the same time, the Government, by the exercise of its great power and its great influence, can do things which are really beyond the rights of the Government to do, and yet that does not make them right. I do not think it is right at all for the Federal Government to attempt to lease either water or land. I do not believe it ever was contemplated in the Constitution that that should be done.

Mr. WALSH. If the Senator will pardon me, I do not mean to say that it is right or that it is wrong. My amendment is addressed to a certain provision of this bill which contemplates, not the sale of these lands, but the leasing of these lands for a period of 50 years, and is addressed only to the question as to what kind of compensation shall be made—not whether or not any shall be made.

Mr. SHAFROTH. That may be. I have not any doubt of the Senator's statement; but the bill, as I understand, does not at the present time say that it shall be a rental. The Senator has put in the word "annual" before the word "charges," and that amendment has not come up as yet. If you make it an annual compensation or an annual charge, it might be that it would be so considered; but according to that, when the Secretary of War came to make an improvement of that kind and say "I want to pay this out; I do not want any leasing arrangement," the Senator would have the Secretary of War determine the question adversely, and perhaps prevent the development of the enterprise.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Before the Senator gets too far away from the point, I understood him to say a moment ago that in the Kansas-Colorado case Mr. Justice Brewer had expressed the opinion that there was no constitutional warrant for the reclamation act. Did I correctly understand the Senator?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes; that is what I intended to say.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I hope the Senator will reread that case. It is some time since I read it, but I think I very distinctly recollect that Mr. Justice Brewer expressed no opinion upon the subject as to whether or not the United States Government could provide for the irrigation of the public lands, but what he had reference to was the expenditure of money for the purpose of irrigating private lands. I had not supposed, since the irrigation law was passed, that there was any doubt whatever as to the validity of it so far as it applied to public lands, and I do not think the Senator from Colorado will find in the Kansas-Colorado decision any expression which indicates that there is any doubt about it.

Mr. SHAFROTH. It has been some time since I read that decision, but I remember very distinctly the statement that he made, that he found no authority in the Federal Constitution. Perhaps it was in the nature of a query—"Where does the authority exist for the purpose of building reservoirs?" I think that was the language, and it may have been applied to the question of the irrigation of private lands, but I think not. I think it covered the whole situation.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. That is not my recollection of it. I will send and get the case, in order to be sure about it.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes; I should be glad to have that done.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. But I want simply to make this observation: So far as I am concerned, I have no doubt whatever that the Government of the United States, having the power under the Constitution to dispose of public lands, has the power to put them in a condition to be disposed of. If, for example, the lands are in such a condition that they will not sell, the Government certainly would have the power to put them in a condition where they would sell. The lands in their arid condition will bring little, if anything; but if the Government provides for irrigating them, then the lands will bring a good price. The power to dispose of lands certainly includes the corollary power to put them in a condition to be disposed of.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, it seems to me that we are drifting from the amendment, which proposes to strike out the words "based upon its value as land"; and it necessarily will follow that the Secretary of War can impose any kind of charges for horsepower used, or anything in the nature of a charge for the water itself, instead of for the land. When he does that, and it is recognized that the water does not belong to the United States Government, it seems to me we are putting in something there that is not right.

The Senator has referred to the fact that lands can be improved by the Government of the United States for the purpose of sale. I have not any doubt but that the court would uphold a leasing bill of the Federal Government for a limited period; but I have not any doubt also that if the bill contained a provision that the Government should never dispose of the lands, it would be held unconstitutional. It can very easily say that a period of 50 years is a very limited period in the history of a country, and that, therefore, it is only something in the nature of a partial disposition of the lands. But the lands are held for disposition by the Government; and though in any given instance the number of years that may be specified would be very limited compared with the life of a nation, yet, notwithstanding, the intention of the framers of the Constitution was that the land at some time should be disposed of—that is the wording of the Constitution. I have no doubt that if there were contained in the act the statement that "these public lands are to be held forever by the Federal Government and not disposed of," it would absolutely impair the sovereignty of the State, which possesses the power of taxation upon all property that is within its borders, and, consequently, would be in violation of the rights of the State.

It seems to me, therefore, that the language which is used here, "based upon its value as land," expresses what you would have to pay for it if you were condemning land. If that is the case, that is all that the Government owns, and consequently it is all that the Government ought to receive for it; and inasmuch as under this bill you have the power vested in the Secretary of War, who can put even a high valuation upon the land, it ought to be satisfactory to everybody. But if you put in limitations of that kind, saying that you can impose a tax upon the water power for the purpose of getting a revenue from it, you will impede the building of these enterprises. The Government of the United States will not get its navigable streams improved for navigation; these men will not undertake an enterprise of that kind, and inevitably you will have failure; and that is the cause of the failure of all the leasing systems the Government has ever undertaken.

The Government undertook to lease the lead mines in 1807, and it took 40 years to repeal the act, but President Polk and President Van Buren declared the system had proved a failure and that it had not paid the Government, and that development had been absolutely checked.

Mr. President, we had a bill here providing for the leasing of coal lands in Alaska, and we heard the declaration made time and again that the people up there were eager for these leases. It was suggested that just as quickly as the President signed the bill there would be people ready to enter into leases for the Alaska coal land. It has been a year and a half since that law was enacted by Congress. I telephoned down to the Interior Department a short time ago and asked them whether any coal leases had been made in Alaska. No; not one.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I do.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think the Senator has brought up an admirable illustration. Of course he is mistaken when he says it was predicted here by the friends of the bill that its passage would be immediately followed by the leasing of land, because it was generally understood that until the railroad development had occurred there would not be any leasing of the land. Nevertheless, the illustration is admirable.

The Senator is taking a position on this bill very much the same as such Senators took who favored allowing the coal lands of Alaska to be frittered away and to pass into private control at practically nominal rates and lost to the people forever. I am taking a position here, the same as I took then, that these valuable resources of the United States should be held and only turned over to private individuals to operate and control temporarily upon just compensation to the people of the United States.

Mr. SHAFROTH. That is just the position that I take, while I do not take it in regard to the leasing system. You can put up the lands and invite all the competition you want, and whatever competition shows that the lands are worth, the Government should receive that amount. The lands should not be hung up for disposition under leases, by which policy it will be found that development will not take place and never could take place under governmental leases.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It seems to me the same evil which resulted when valuable timberlands of the United States worth many dollars an acre passed into the hands of private individuals at $2.50 an acre will occur if this bill is passed without providing some reasonable compensation to be paid by the private corporations to the Government for the use of the valuable privilege.

Mr. SHAFROTH. The Government does not grant any privilege. The Government does not own the water, consequently it can not grant the privilege; and when any persons want to carry on one of these enterprises for the improvement of navigable streams they proceed as if they had the right of eminent domain. Whatever that land is worth in the market for whatever use it may be applied, I am perfectly willing it should be paid to the Government.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I am amazed that the Senator should say that the Government of the United States can not grant this privilege if this bill does not pass, that rivers can not be dammed, that those power plants can not be developed, that those companies can not control them. If this bill does pass, the mere consent of the Government of the United States will permit those private companies to dam a navigable river and develop power to operate a power plant at a great profit. How in the face of that can the Senator say the Government of the United States can not do this thing which the bill proposes to do?

Mr. SHAFROTH. As an incident to a navigation scheme, of course, it can authorize it; but the purpose of this bill is to charge a certain amount for the flow of the water—to put it into horsepower, and charge so much a horsepower. That is the object and the purpose.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator does not speak to the point.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I am speaking to the point.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. He says the Federal Government can not bestow this right upon a private individual.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Of course, as a matter of fact, when you take into consideration that we pass a law and nobody is interested in disputing it, it might have the effect. But Congress has no more right to pass a law charging for water when it does not own the water than I have to say I will sell water that does not belong to me. It may be like the instances in early days, where a man would make a deed to 160 acres and would say, "I also grant to the said party the public range extending for 6 miles or 10 miles east." He has no power to do it; yet it was respected to a large extent by people, because he had the run of cattle there.

So, if I were to say I will sell the Mississippi River somebody might be able to try to do something in the way of utilizing the benefits, but if the Government does not own the water, what right have we to say we will sell the water in the stream?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator admits, if the bill passes, private corporations will be authorized to dam these navigable rivers, and they will be permitted to develop water power and convert it into electrical current and to sell it at profit. They derive that right from this bill from the Government of the United States.

Mr. SHAFROTH. No; they do not. They derive that right from the charter granted in the State where they are situated, authorizing them as corporations to do these things.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. But there is not a charter in any State.

Mr. SHAFROTH. That may be; but there is a grant of authority over it.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The gist of it is that they derive the right and the power to operate from the Government of the United States. Now, I ask the Senator again, Why should these corporations receiving that valuable opportunity not pay something for it?

Mr. SHAFROTH. They are. These corporations are erecting dams across rivers to back the water up so ships and boats can navigate. They turn over to the Government an enterprise that cost them a million or two million dollars, and the Government is relieved of expense to that extent. Yet, notwithstanding all that public benefit, it is proposed to put a charge on every unit of horsepower that is generated. The Senator may think we can get improvements under such restrictions, but he will find that we will not.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator raises another point. That depends altogether on whether the Secretary of War makes a fair charge for this privilege. I say it is not thinkable after this bill passes, that the Secretary of War will make charges so extravagant that the bill can not be carried into effect.

Mr. SHAFROTH. It is not the fact that he might do something that is good, but it is the vesting of power in any man to determine this matter. I will give the Senator an illustration as to just what has been done. About 10 or 12 years ago there had been a great development of water power in the West, not on navigable streams, but on nonnavigable streams. The conservationists came to the House of Representatives; I was on the Committee on the Public Lands in the other House; probably 12 or 15 years ago they said the Government was being blocked in water-power development because certain persons were applying for water-power sites on streams and would not give up their claims when they failed to comply with the law, and inasmuch as it was difficult to remove the cloud from the titles, they wanted an act of Congress which would permit filing or applications for revocable permits. They said if a company was going ahead in good faith to build a plant there would be no trouble; the permit would never be revoked. They said we have in the law for national banks the power to repeal, amend, and revoke, but it has never been exercised.

These men said we have in the charters of the railway companies in the District of Columbia the right of Congress to revoke, and they are never revoked. For that reason they said there would be no danger whatever.

But, Mr. President, after this permit law was passed, a man in the Interior Department concluded that he would force a leasing system upon the West. Notwithstanding all the filings had been made under the laws of the United States in effect at that time, and everybody supposed that the permits would be scrupulously respected as in the past, one Secretary of the Interior, two days before he left the office, without assigning any reason whatever, after the plant had been constructed and when it was in full operation, when from its station near Glenwood Springs it was sending electricity over the main mountain range to supply the city of Denver with light and with power for running the street railways—under that authority he revoked its permit and 40 other permits and notified the permittees that if they would not enter into leases paying so much per horsepower he would command them to get off the public domain.

Now, that is the trouble. One Secretary may be all right, but we are legislating here for all time, and we should restrict them as to what they shall charge, and that, it seems to me, is the fair way. In fact, I think it is arbitrary to vest in any executive officer the power to determine these land values, because there is no appeal from his decision. There is no appeal to a jury or to a commission. There is no right to go to a court to complain of a wrong and arbitrary act. But even conceding, for the argument, that the power should exist in the Secretary of War, there is no reason on earth, it seems to me, to permit language to be used that will say that he can put into the charge for land an element of water which the Government of the United States does not own and never did own.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to call the attention of the Senator to the fact that if the bill is unamended it leaves it in the discretion of the Secretary to deny every application.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes; I said that. I should like to construct a bill that would add more rights of determining these matters than this bill, but I can not amend it.

Mr. NORRIS. Based on that, I wish to ask the Senator if he would favor an amendment to section 1 of the bill that would provide instead of the Secretary of War giving the right to construct dams that that power should be left in Congress?

Mr. SHAFROTH. No; that might be very difficult to administer; it might be very difficult to get any charge whatever.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to call the attention of the Senator to the fact that we can not build a bridge across a navigable stream without a special act.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Certainly we can not.

Mr. NORRIS. Although we have a general act. If you pass a general act providing what should be done, what provision should be made, like this bill, with a modification which would provide that instead of the Secretary of War giving the permit they should get a permit from Congress, does the Senator think that would be an improvement?

Mr. SHAFROTH. It is a little too cumbersome to do that. I want to say to the Senator the right of the Congress of the United States to act upon the question of bridges is under the clause of the Constitution providing for interstate commerce, which says it shall have the right to prevent obstructions. It is not an affirmative right at all. You can not construct a bridge across a river in a State without going to the legislature of the State.

Mr. NORRIS. I understand that.

Mr. SHAFROTH. That is the reason. It is simply a negative power—a veto power against obstruction to prevent navigation from being impaired.

Mr. NORRIS. But the Senator brought out my question from his objection to some of the propositions laid down by my colleague. We ought not to give this discretionary power, the Senator said, to any one man—it ought not to be given to a Secretary—but the very bill he is defending gives all the discretion to some Cabinet officer. I ask the Senator now——

Mr. SHAFROTH. I will state to the Senator I am discussing the amendment. There are a great many things in the bill I do not like.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; but the objection the Senator makes is that he does not want to give the discretionary power to the Secretary of War.

Mr. SHAFROTH. And the corollary of that, of course, is that I want just as little discretionary power as we can give; and, inasmuch as this amendment enlarges that power instead of diminishing it, I am against it.

Mr. NORRIS. That is consistent from the Senator's standpoint. Now, the question I wish to ask the Seantor is whether he is willing to go further than that?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I might be willing to go further, because there has to be some kind of supervision as to navigation. Of course, the plans for a plant that goes into the stream there have to meet with the approval of the Secretary, and the Secretary can, if he wants, absolutely prohibit it. There is no doubt about that. Yet, at the same time, I must say that, in order to get some kind of legislation and some kind of development of this kind, a law granting some rights, even if they are beyond what I think should be granted, probably will result.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

Mr. SHAFROTH. I yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I merely wish to qualify to some extent the statement the Senator made a minute ago in regard to the leasing of coal lands in Alaska. It may be true that no coal lands have been leased there, but there has not been an opportunity given to lease them. The coal lands have not been segregated into tracts. The report of the surveyor who has been working upon that survey has just been completed within the last two or three days.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I do not——

Mr. POINDEXTER. My statement will be very brief. I wish to add that there is no opportunity to develop coal mines in Alaska, under the leasing system or any other system, because there is no transportation. The Government is engaged under the law which we passed in building a railroad, but it is a long distance from the coal field as yet, and very little progress has been made on it. They have not started to build a railroad to the Bering River coal fields. They have begun to build a railroad to the Matanuska coal fields, but it is not yet completed.

Now, just one other remark in this connection——

Mr. SHAFROTH. I will ask the Senator this question right there. Does not the Senator suppose, if there had been any application for leasing, there would have been a survey made for the purpose of permitting the lease?

Mr. POINDEXTER. The survey is being pursued as rapidly as possible.

Mr. SHAFROTH. You can get a special survey for particular land if you want.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The man in charge of the work there is a very diligent and a very competent man. I do not think he has delayed the matter in any way at all, but under the law as it existed before the Alaska leasing bill was passed there were no coal mines developed, and the reason why the applications were canceled in most cases to which the Senator has referred was the very fact that they had not developed coal mines. The law required them to develop coal mines, and they failed to do it.

Mr. SHAFROTH. The reason why there has been no development there is because the lands were withdrawn from entry. That was the reason. They could not go on the lands and attempt to take them. I do not care what permit you establish to get the value of the land. If you want to appraise it as State lands are appraised and sell them at auction, all right and good; but I object to estimating the value of coal lands by the supposed quantity of coal in the lands and multiplying that by so much per ton. By imposing under a classification rule such exorbitant prices prevented the development of the West, and consequently the coal lands have not been taken up. Only 4,000 acres in all the United States were taken up under the coal-land laws of the United States in the past year, and according to that if the 4,000 acres were all taken up in my State alone it would take 200 years to acquire all the coal lands in that Commonwealth alone. That is development with a vim.

Mr. President, such high valuation of coal lands prevents acquisition and development, and results in a monopoly for the coal owners who own their land and are selling to the public. When they make a profit, and do not have to meet the competition of new companies, they will raise the price of the coal. They have raised the price out in that western country very much. Higher prices are paid now than would be if there had been competition.

I want to say that I am perfectly willing that you shall in every way curb these corporations to prevent monopoly. If you want to limit the area of coal lands which may be owned by a corporation or individual, all right and good. If you want to put in the clause against combinations and trusts, all right and good. It meets with my hearty approval.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President——

Mr. SHAFROTH. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I do not rise to take issue with what the Senator is saying by way of stricture on the leasing proposition, because I heartily agree with him, but if it will not disturb the Senator to return a moment to the subject we were discussing a little while ago——

Mr. SHAFROTH. Very well.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I have before me the decision in the Kansas-Colorado case. The court after quoting section 3 of Article IV of the Constitution, which is the clause which provides that Congress shall have the power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property of the United States, and so on, said:

> The full scope of this paragraph has never been definitely settled. Primarily, at least, it is a grant of power to the United States of control over its property. That is implied by the words "territory or other property." It is true it has been referred to in some decisions as granting political and legislative control over the Territories as distinguished from the States of the Union. It is unnecessary in the present case to consider whether the language justifies this construction. Certainly we have no disposition to limit or qualify the expressions which have heretofore fallen from this court in respect thereto.

This next sentence is the one to which I particularly invite the Senator's attention:

> But clearly it does not grant to Congress any legislative control over the States, and must, so far as they are concerned—

That is, so far as the States are concerned—

> be limited to authority over the property belonging to the United States within their limits.

Which is, it seems to me, a very clear implication that in the mind of the court Congress would have the power to provide for a system of irrigation in so far as the public lands of the United States were concerned within the limits of a State, and, perhaps, within the limits of the Territories would have the right to go still further. I think it is important to call attention to that because——

Mr. SHAFROTH. But there is also another clause in that decision——

Mr. SUTHERLAND. If the Senator from Colorado will permit me to finish—I think it would be unfortunate to have the idea go to the country that there was any doubt in the mind of the Senate, and particularly in the minds of Senators who represent the arid States, as to the constitutionality of the reclamation act.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I wish the Senator from Utah would read the clause to which I referred. There is some statement in that decision as to the power of Congress to construct reservoirs, though I can not now call attention to it.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. There is——

Mr. SHAFROTH. I want to conclude what I have to say in regard to this matter.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I want to say to the Senator that I have read over very carefully the portion of the decision which has any reference to this subject, and I do not find any such clause as the one to which the Senator refers.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Well, Mr. President, whether the United States has authority or not—which I do not think it has—to charge for water, when the Government of the United States does not even claim that it owns any part of the water even if it has the power, is it expedient for it to do it? The Government of the United States is inviting men of capital to come in and help improve the rivers in the United States by the construction of dams; that is the primary object; millions of dollars will be spent for the purpose of that development.

The Government gets the entire benefit of it; it gets, without the expenditure of a cent, construction that would cost the Government, under the river and harbor act, perhaps millions of dollars. Is it wise, even if the power exists, to load down such an enterprise by saying that, in addition to that expenditure, there shall be a charge for the land taken, and not only for the land, but there shall be charged a royalty on the water, which does not belong to the United States, and which, even if the water did belong to the United States, would be a charge which, of course, would be a tax upon the people. A tax upon the people of one part of a State or one part of the United States is not exactly fair, unless its benefits are given back to them. While this bill provides that the money received from this charge shall be used as a fund for the purpose of making improvements, yet, as a matter of fact, if there is an excessive charge which is imposed upon every person who burns electricity, you can readily see that it never comes back directly to him.

Mr. BRANDEGEE rose.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Does the Senator from Connecticut wish to ask me a question?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I want to ask the Senator from Colorado a question before he takes his seat.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Colorado a question at this point.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes, sir.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Colorado is making an argument against the amendment offered by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], which, as I understand, proposes to strike out the words "based upon its value as land." Without saying anything about the merits of the amendment, does not the Senator from Colorado think that the idea that he is combating so earnestly is in the text of the bill as it now stands?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Oh, yes. There are some portions of the bill to which I do not agree.

Mr. CUMMINS. No; I am speaking about this particular matter as it is now. The bill proposes to base the charges "upon its value as land." Then it proceeds:

> And in fixing such charges consideration shall be taken of the benefits accruing from the use and occupation of such lands to the interests of navigation, as well as to the business of said grantee.

Suppose the bill were left as it is even, and the amendment defeated, still the Secretary of War would be required to take into account the value of the land to the grantee and the business in which it proposes to engage.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I repeat that there are many provisions in the bill to which I do not agree, and I want to modify just as many of them as I can. It is quite likely that the statement which the Senator from Iowa has made has force in it, but I do not want it left by implication, at least that by striking out this clause—which was put in by the committee, as I understand, for the very purpose of negativing such an idea—that the Government would have the right to impose a charge upon the horsepower generated by the plant.

Mr. CUMMINS. That is the very point to which I was calling the attention of the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. SHAFROTH. It may be that other language does it.

Mr. CUMMINS. The committee has not accomplished its purpose, if that was its purpose; that is, to make the charge dependent solely upon the value of the land as land, because very clearly the Secretary of War is told to base it also upon its value to the business of the grantee.

Mr. SHAFROTH. That may be. If it is, I do not like that part of the proposed act; but I will look at it more closely.

Mr. President, it seems to me that this amendment ought not to be sustained whether the other language is in the bill or not. We can take that up when we come to it; but, as a matter of fact, this looks like an attempt to impose a charge for the water, which is something that the Government of the United States does not own, and which, so far as its expediency is concerned, would hamper and prevent enterprises of this kind from being undertaken. It seems to me it would be unwise to adopt the amendment offered by the Senator from Montana.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Colorado yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I do.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Before the Senator takes his seat, would he be kind enough to again read the extract from the Chandler-Dunbar case which he read to the Senate a while ago as to the rule of damages? I did not fully catch the language when he read it.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I shall be glad to do so. This is the extract:

> In the case of the United States v. Chandler-Dunbar Co. (229 U. S.), the Supreme Court held that land necessary and taken for the improvement of navigation should be valued as land and for what it is worth as land, and not for what it might be worth for other purposes.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, the Senator is not quoting the exact language of the court in that extract, is he?

Mr. SHAFROTH. This was handed to me by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD]. I have not compared it with the decision, but that is the statement, which has evidently been taken from the spirit of the decision, if it be not its exact language.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I was interested to learn whether it was somebody else's inference from the decision or whether it was the language of the court.

Mr. President, I think it is of a good deal of consequence as to what the rule of damages shall be if one of these private corporations is to take public lands. I think the rule should be just what it is in a condemnation proceeding.

Mr. SHAFROTH. That is what we are perfectly willing to do.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. And for that purpose I should like to have the Secretary read the extract from the Chandler-Dunbar decision, in Two hundred and twenty-ninth United States, which I have marked. I think it is one of the latest utterances of the court, and I think it is right in point. The case was decided in 1912.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

Having decided that the Chandler-Dunbar Co. as riparian owners had no such vested property right in the water power inherent in the falls and rapids of the river, and no right to place in the river the works essential to any practical use of the flow of the river, the Government can not be justly required to pay for an element of value which did not inhere in these parcels as upland. The Government had dominion over the water power of the rapids and falls and can not be required to pay any hypothetical additional value to a riparian owner who had no right to appropriate the current to his own commercial use. These additional values represent, therefore, no actual loss and there would be no justice in paying for a loss suffered by no one in fact. "The requirement of the fifth amendment is satisfied when the owner is paid for what is taken from him. The question is what has the owner lost, and not what has the taker gained." (Boston Chamber of Commerce v. Boston, 217 U. S., 189, 194, 195.)

Neither can consideration be given to probable advancement in the value of such riparian property by reason of the works to be constructed in the river by the Government or the use to which the flow of the stream might be directed by the Government. The value should be fixed as of the date of the proceeding and with reference to the loss the owner sustains, considering the property in its condition and situation at the time it is taken and not as enhanced by the purpose for which it was taken (Kerr v. Park Commissioners, 117 U. S., 379, 387; Shoemaker v. United States, 147 U. S., 282, 304, 305.)

The exception taken to the inclusion as an element of value of the availability of these parcels of land for lock and canal purposes must be overruled. That this land had a prospective value for the purpose of constructing a canal and lock parallel with those in use had passed beyond the region of the purely conjectural or speculative. That one or more additional parallel canals and locks would be needed to meet the increasing demands of lake traffic was an immediate probability. This land was the only land available for the purpose. It included all the land between the canals in use and the bank of the river. Although it is not proper to estimate land condemned for public purposes by the public necessities or its worth to the public for such purpose, it is proper to consider the fact that the property is so situated that it will probably be desired and available for such a purpose. (Lewis on Eminent Domain, sec. 707; Boom Co. v. Patterson, 98 U. S., 403, 408; Shoemaker v. United States, 147 U. S., 282; Young v. Harrison, 17 Ga., 30; Alloway v. Nashville, 88 Tenn., 510; Sargent v. Merrimac, 196 Mass., 171.) Boom Co. v. Patterson was this: A boom company sought to condemn three small islands in the Mississippi River so situated with reference to each other and the river bank as to be peculiarly adapted to form a boom a mile in length. The question in the case was whether their adaptability for that purpose gave the property a special value which might be considered. This court held that the adaptability of the land for the purposes of a boom was an element which should be considered in estimating the value of the lands condemned. The court said, touching the rule for estimating damages in such cases:

So many and varied are the circumstances to be taken into account in determining the value of property condemned for public purposes that it is perhaps impossible to formulate a rule to govern its appraisement in all cases. Exceptional circumstances will modify the most carefully guarded rule, but, as a general thing, we should say that the compensation to the owner is to be estimated by reference to the uses for which the property is suitable, having regard to the existing business or wants of the community, or such as may be reasonably expected in the immediate future.

In Shoemaker v. United States, supra, lands were condemned for park purposes. In the court below the commissioners were instructed to estimate each piece of land at its market value, and that "the market of the land includes its value for any use to which it may be put, and all the uses to which it is adapted, and not merely the condition in which it is at the present time and the use to which it is now applied by the owner; * * * that if by reason of its location, its surroundings, its natural advantages, its artificial improvement, or its intrinsic character it is peculiarly adapted to some particular use—e. g., to the use of a public park—all the circumstances which make up this adaptability may be shown, and the fact of such adaptation may be taken into consideration in estimating the compensation." The court approved this instruction.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I thank the Senator very much for having that opinion read. It seems to me it supports, in every particular, the extract or the syllabus which I have read. It seems to me also that it shows that the Government of the United States would have a proprietary right only, and would not have jurisdiction over things which it does not own; that the Government holds property just exactly in the same way as private individuals hold property; and that when property is taken for an enterprise the same compensation should be paid the Government as should be paid to an individual. I regard any exaction which is beyond that as not authorized, as wrong, and as inimical to the development of the enterprises that would be undertaken under this bill.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I agree with the Senator that the Government's control of property which it owns—for instance, public lands—is similar to that of a proprietor, a private person; and if the Government's property is to be taken, I think it ought to be taken and its value determined by the same rule which would govern the taking of the property of a private person; but clearly, under this decision, as it seems to me, if the property to be taken from the Government is a piece of land upon a navigable river which is peculiarly adapted as a power site, its availability for that purpose and its value for that purpose ought to be considered in determining the compensation to be paid for it.

Mr. SHAFROTH. It is an element which can be considered; there is no doubt about that; but it is the market value that determines, and the question of demand for it is one of the elements entering into it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Yes; but I got the idea that the Senator's claim was that its availability for a power purpose should not be considered, but that the land should be considered simply from the standpoint of its value as land, independently of the fact that it was on the bank of a navigable stream.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Well, no. I think all that would be asked would be that the amount of compensation should be that which the private individual would have under a condemnation suit.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I entirely agree with the Senator, then, if that is his claim.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, I desire to address myself to the merits of the bill as a whole and not to the amendment offered by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH].

There are a number of bills before the Senate and in committees dealing with the question that is now submitted to the Senate and involving the same principles. The present bill attempts to deal with two different purposes for which water may be diverted from a stream and used and the necessary structures placed in a navigable stream. One of them is under the jurisdiction and control of the National Government, represented by the Secretary of War. The other is peculiarly under the jurisdiction of the States. That is a matter over which the Federal Government has no jurisdiction and no power to act under the Constitution.

I desire to call to the attention of the Senate some of the provisions of this bill that lead me to that conclusion. The attempt that is being made in these several bills to trench upon the power and jurisdiction and sovereignty of the States has been very earnestly opposed by a number of Senators, especially those representing the western semiarid States, where irrigation is necessary. I have been amazed to find that some of the Senators who have heretofore earnestly opposed legislation of this kind are now not only not opposing the bill before the Senate, but, as I understand, are disposed to support it.

It has been said by some that this bill is less harmful in that respect than some of the others; and that may be true, Mr. President, if it is strictly limited to actually navigable streams. But the principle involved in this bill is precisely the same as that involved in the other bills against which we have been so earnestly contending.

Let me call attention to some of the provisions that are, to my mind, exceedingly objectionable from the point of view of those of us who have been opposing this kind of legislation.

In the very first section it is provided:

That the United States hereby authorizes any of the persons as hereinafter defined, after obtaining the permit of the Secretary of War as hereinafter provided, to construct, maintain, and operate a dam or dams or diversion structures and accessory works—

Now, mind you, Mr. President, the construction of diversion structures and accessory works can only be for the purpose of taking the water out of the stream to be used for irrigation or for the development of power, or for other purposes of like kind—for the development and improvement of navigation and for water power or other purposes.

So far as this is an attempt to bring about the improvement of navigation, it is strictly within the powers of the National Government, and it is entirely proper that the Secretary of War should be authorized to issue the necessary permit for that purpose. The bill does not stop at that, however. It provides for the construction of these works "for water power or other purposes." Now, mark the effect of it. It is not confined even to the development of power. It goes to the extent of authorizing the Secretary of War to issue permits for the purpose of storing and diverting water for purposes of irrigation, over which I claim the National Government has no power or jurisdiction.

The Secretary of War has the undoubted right to pass upon the question as to whether a structure shall be placed in a navigable stream, but he acts solely upon the question as to whether or not it is an interference with navigation. The question as to whether the structure can be used for other purposes—for example, the development of power or the irrigation of lands—is a matter with which the Secretary of War and the Government have no concern. It does not rest within the power or the jurisdiction of the National Government to determine whether water shall be diverted from a flowing stream in one of the States for purposes of irrigation or for the development of power. There is an ingenious effort made here to combine the two and make it appear that they are for a legitimate purpose, but tacking on to it something that, so far as the National Government is concerned, is illegitimate and unauthorized.

In providing the conditions that may be imposed by the Secretary of War it will be found that he is given authority to prevent the construction of any works of this kind in a navigable stream for the purpose of developing power or for purposes of irrigation by a mere refusal upon his part to issue the permit, not upon the ground that it will interfere with navigation or obstruct a navigable stream—a matter upon which he has a perfect right to pass—but upon the ground that the works that are proposed to be placed in the river are not adequate for the purpose of developing power or for irrigation. That is a matter with which the Secretary of War has nothing whatever to do; it is not within his jurisdiction; and yet by this means power is attempted to be conferred upon the Secretary of War that directly interferes with the rights of the States to determine whether water shall be diverted for purposes of irrigation or development of power and what kind of structures shall be placed in the streams for those purposes.

Let me read a little further:

> And such grantee and such permit shall at all times be subject to the provisions of this act and also subject to such conditions as the Secretary of War shall, in accordance with the provisions of this act, make a part of such permit; * * * Provided, That when the power to be developed by the project and improvement of the stream for navigation is used or to be used for a public-utility purpose or purposes, the grantee must be a municipal corporation, or a political subdivision, or other agencies of a State, or a public-service agent of a State, or a public-utility corporation created and organized under the laws of a State or the United States, authorized to engage in the business of furnishing water, heat, or electric energy for public or private use, and whose rates and charges and service shall be subject to regulation by the laws of the State or a duly constituted commission or other agency of said State; but in any case where the State has not made provision for authorizing municipal corporations, political subdivisions, or other agencies of the State or public-utility corporations or agencies to engage in said business, the qualifications of the grantee prescribed in this proviso shall not apply.

That is to say, the attempt is made to give the National Government the jurisdiction over the control of the supply and use of the water and the rates in case a State has not provided a utility body to do that work. The State has the right to determine whether the rates shall be governed and controlled and regulated by a utility body or not, and certainly under the Constitution no jurisdiction of that kind can be extended to the National Government, because of the fact that the State fails to act; but that is precisely what is attempted to be done in the bill.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. WORKS. I do.

Mr. BORAH. I understand that the Senator construes this bill to the effect that because a State has failed to perform some function which devolves upon the State, therefore the National Government can draw to itself the power to perform that function?

Mr. WORKS. That is precisely what I hold—that that is the construction that must be placed upon the bill.

Again:

> And no transfer of any such permit or of the rights thereunder granted, except by trust deed or mortgage issued for the bona fide purpose of financing the business of such grantee, shall be made by any grantee, without the approval of the Secretary of War, to any transferee not having the qualifications herein specified for a grantee hereunder.

Complete control is given the National Government to determine who shall take out and use the water and who shall divert it for public purposes. The State is helpless to provide for the diversion and distribution of the water, and is subject always to the will of the Secretary of War and such conditions as he may impose.

Now, let me go a little further. Section 2 of the bill provides the conditions that may be imposed by the Secretary of War in the issuance of the permits. First, it provides that "the plans and specifications for such dams and all accessory works, together with such drawings of the proposed construction and such maps," and so forth, "shall be submitted to the Secretary of War." That is entirely proper for one purpose—that is, to determine whether the structure will interfere with navigation—but the Secretary of War has no right to consider any other question except the one whether it does affect navigation. There is, however, no such limitation of his powers placed in the bill:

> Second. The project adopted, including the plans, specifications, and location for any dam and accessory work, shall be such as in the judgment of the Secretary of War shall be best adapted to a comprehensive plan for the improvement of the waterway in question for the uses of navigation and for the full development of its water power and for other beneficial public purposes, and best adapted to conserve and utilize the water resources of the region in the interests of navigation, the needs of the Government, and the public welfare.

What broader power could be conferred upon the Secretary of War in dealing with that question than is contained in this clause of the section? He may determine whether these works are adequate for the purpose, not of improving navigation—that he has a right to determine—but whether they are adequate for the purpose of diverting and using the water for any purpose, whether it be the development of power or irrigation or manufacturing or for domestic uses; because, as I have pointed out, in this section of the bill it is provided that the permit may be given for the purpose of developing power or for other purposes without any limitation.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. WORKS. I yield.

Mr. JONES. I take it that the Senator would like to have any dam that is constructed at any point on a stream take care not only of the navigation but also of these other possibilities, and I should like to ask him what suggestion he would have to make. Would he have our bill provide for the granting of a permit for navigation purposes, and then expect the permittee also to get a permit from the State specifying the character of the dam that he should construct in order to take care of these other desired developments?

Mr. WORKS. That is precisely what we must do if we follow the Constitution, because one is under the jurisdiction of the National Government, and the other—the diversion of the water for the purposes I have mentioned—is peculiarly within the jurisdiction and control of the State. I will say to the Senator from Washington that it may be a very nice thing to have the Government control this whole matter if it is properly done, and provision is made for the proper use of the water, but that is not the question. The question is whether it is the legal, the legitimate, way to do it. Another thing that impresses itself upon my mind is that the Secretary of War not only may do this thing for the benefit of the public and in the interest of the State, but he is given the power absolutely to refuse to do it and prevent the development of the water power or the distribution of water.

Mr. JONES. One other question, if the Senator will permit me. What would the Senator provide to take care of a situation like this: Suppose the Secretary of War grants a permit for the improvement of the navigation of a stream, and then the State refuses to permit further development or the building of a dam for any other purposes?

Mr. WORKS. That is precisely what the State has a right to do, and what it is its duty to do.

Mr. JONES. Would the Senator want the whole improvement blocked in that way?

Mr. WORKS. Why, certainly, if it is not in the interest of the public. The State will determine that question, and it is the only authority that has any right to determine it. The State may be of opinion that it ought not to be developed for power purposes, for example, if the permit is issued for that purpose, but that the water should be used for irrigation purposes; and it is proposed by this bill to cut off the right of the State to determine that question.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. WORKS. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. Assuming, for the sake of the argument, that we can do what this bill undertakes to do—to wit, lodge in the Secretary of War the power to determine for what purposes this water shall be developed, including navigation and all other purposes—assuming it to be true that we could do that, suppose, then, that a State should determine that it wanted this water for irrigation purposes. The Secretary of War would have a right to say: "No; you must use this water for some other purpose, for supplying a city, for power purposes, or something of that kind," or for any other purpose that the Secretary of War might deem more desirable. In other words, if we can do what the bill purports to do, the State might desire the water for irrigation purposes, and might be entirely deprived of it for that purpose.

Mr. WORKS. Certainly; that is the effect of it, unquestionably.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. WORKS. I yield.

Mr. WALSH. I am very much interested in the discussion which the Senator is pursuing, and I should like to get a rather clear idea about just exactly what he would do. Let us take the case of the rapids at Keokuk, and we will assume that the river has not been dammed there. Along what general principles and lines would the Senator proceed? One wants to erect a dam across there. What would the Senator provide?

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, there is but one course to pursue. The State has the right to determine whether the water shall be taken out and used for any given purpose. The State may grant the permit to take out the water of a navigable stream the same as any other, as the Senator knows.

Mr. WALSH. Yes; we agree about that.

Mr. WORKS. The Secretary of War, if that permission were given, would have the right to determine whether this structure should be erected, determining that question with regard to its effects upon navigation, and nothing else.

Mr. WALSH. Well, yes. The Senator, then, as I understand him, would repose in the Secretary of War the power to say whether or not a navigable stream shall be dammed?

Mr. WORKS. As affecting the question of navigation only. The Secretary of War would have no right to determine whether the dam should be constructed or not, judging from the use that might be made of the water after it was taken out of the stream; and that is what this bill provides for.

Mr. WALSH. The Senator would, then, repose in the Secretary of War the right to say whether or not the dam should be erected?

Mr. WORKS. Why, of course, under the limitation that I have stated.

Mr. WALSH. Now, then, would the Senator repose in the Secretary of War the right to say anything at all about what kind of a structure should be erected?

Mr. WORKS. Certainly, in determining it upon the question of the effect upon navigation.

Mr. WALSH. I ask the Senator what more this bill provides than that the Secretary, to whom the application is made, must prescribe the terms and conditions under which the structure is to be erected?

Mr. WORKS. The Senator evidently has not been listening to what I said.

Mr. WALSH. Yes; quite intently.

Mr. WORKS. Then I have been unable to convey to him how I really construe the bill. My objection to it, stated briefly, is that the conditions imposed allow the Secretary of War to determine not whether this will have any effect upon navigation, but whether the works are adequate for the development and supply of the water as provided in the bill, which is quite another thing.

Mr. WALSH. The Secretary is authorized to pass upon the plans and specifications.

Mr. WORKS. Yes; but the bill provides for a good deal more than that.

Mr. WALSH. Let me make an inquiry of the Senator then. An application for a permit to dam a navigable stream is granted. What is there that puts a limitation upon the power of the Secretary to say that it shall be dammed at that particular place or not?

Mr. WORKS. Only the Constitution, if it is for the purpose of development of power. Let me read another subdivision of the third clause of this section:

(b) That such grantee shall furnish free of cost power for the operation of the same—

That is, in respect to certain works that are to be constructed or may be constructed by the Government—

(c) that in case such navigation facilities shall not be made a part of such original construction at the expense of the grantee, then, whenever the United States shall deem such navigation facilities necessary the grantee shall convey to the United States free of cost such of its land and its right of way.

It is a singular thing, Mr. President, that the Secretary of War is authorized to turn over to a private individual or a private corporation the right to enter upon a navigable stream and construct the necessary work for the improvement of navigation, to begin with. It is a function which belongs to the Government. To allow the Secretary to give out the right to somebody else by a mere permit to construct public works is to change the entire policy of the Government with respect to the construction of public improvements. But it must be assumed that if these works are to be constructed under a permit by the Government for the purpose of improving navigation they are to be beneficial to the Government and not hurtful. Certainly unless that is shown, and that is the reason for constructing these works, there is no reason why the Government should give its permit to a private individual to do the work. The bill itself provides that it is for the purpose of improving navigation.

If that is so and the Government is to receive a private benefit from the construction by a private individual, why should it charge him compensation for what is done for the benefit of the Government, and charge it up to the consumer, for that is just what will happen?

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HUGHES in the chair). Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. WORKS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SHERMAN. What does the Senator think in reference to the ability of the Government along the Mississippi River, for instance, in the State of Iowa, to authorize a private grantee of the kind referred to in the section to enter upon the bank or the riparian rights in the State of Iowa, which I understand under their own decision extends to the middle channel of the Mississippi River, and make the contemplated improvement? The act for the admission of Iowa into the Union on the same footing as any of the thirteen original States, as I understand it, ipso facto vested in the State of Iowa the title to all the land between the high water or the ordinary stage of water and the center of the Mississippi River. It has been given the State of Iowa in trust for the people, there being only a regulation for purposes of navigation by the Government. What would be the power of Congress in that event to authorize the Secretary of War by a permit to vest in the private grantee the right to enter upon that territory and appropriate it for any purpose?

Mr. WORKS. The Government has no such authority.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. WORKS. Certainly.

Mr. NELSON. The Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] is in error about the State of Iowa. Under their decisions, I think, the riparian owner owns only to the water's edge. It is in Illinois where you have the common-law doctrine that the riparian owner owns to the thread or center of the stream.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, if the Senator will examine, I think both the State decisions and the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, he will find this distinction. In Illinois the private riparian owner, a farmer or manufacturer, owns as private ownership to the center of the navigable channel ordinarily used by pilots in navigating the river. That private ownership you or I myself might own in perpetuity, and when we grant the fee of the land alongside it necessarily carries the bed of the river covered by the water to the center as private ownership. We can cut ice or grass, control the right of fishing, hunting, and the like as of a private ownership, and all the incidents which attach to the estate. This is a matter, however, controlled either by the legislature or by the supreme court decisions of the various States.

In the State of Iowa, if I remember the decision correctly, instead of the private ownership of the riparian owner of the bank being to the center of the stream, there being a strip of land that would inhere to the owner of the fee in Illinois, that strip of land lying between the bank of the river in its ordinary stage or in some stage, I think at high water, flood tide, to the center of the navigable stream belongs to the State. I know from knowledge that in some States and in Illinois, in the case of an inland lake, the title to the bed of the lake vests in the State.

Mr. NELSON. That is exactly what I said a moment ago substantially, but the Senator from Illinois made the mistake of mentioning the common-law right as applied to the State of Iowa.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think, Mr. President, I made no mistake. In trying to distinguish it in such a way I did not mention the common law. The common law in some States of the Union, that has been the rule for many years, adopting it from the Virginia statutes coming up by way of Kentucky. In certain States in the northwestern territory that is the rule, and among others Illinois, but in the State of Iowa the policy is different and the Supreme Court decision is different. The strip of land lying between the bank and the center of the stream has been changed either by decision or by the legislature so that the common-law rule does not apply. The common-law rule does not apply in the State of Iowa.

Mr. NELSON. That is exactly what I said.

Mr. SHERMAN. In reference to Iowa—and if the Senator will go back to what the reporter will write out he will see I said that in the State of Iowa that strip of land is held by the State of Iowa in trust for all the people of Iowa—I ask the Senator from California if that is so, how the Government would enter upon that strip of land and use it through granting a permit to any private owner? The common-law doctrine does apply in Illinois. It applies in certain other States following the east bank of the Mississippi River until Louisiana is reached, where the civil law lays down an entirely different rule.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, I was not at the time I was interrupted discussing the question of the acquisition of title to the land. I was considering solely the question of the use of the water. But I think it is thoroughly determined by the decision of the courts that the State has jurisdiction over the land bordering on and under the stream subject only to the right of the Government to use and control it for navigation purposes, and the Government has no other right respecting the land than that.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. WORKS. I yield.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] stated with exact precision the law in Iowa, and so did the Senator from Illinois state it accurately. The very point now mentioned by the Senator from California is bothering the people of Iowa a good deal. It will be remembered that a few years ago Congress gave to a company organized, I believe, in Maine—I can not remember the State—the authority to build a dam across the Mississippi River at Keokuk. The State of Iowa gave to that company the power to exercise the right of eminent domain in acquiring the riparian privileges; that is, certain lands were overflowed by the reason of the water, and the damages which arose in that way to the riparian owners was to be established through the process of eminent domain.

The question whether that company had a right to use the bed of the river—that is, between the ordinary high-water mark and the bed of the stream—is now in dispute in my State. The company proceeded to build a dam at a very large expense without the consent of Iowa, and occupied that part of the bed of the stream mentioned by the Senator from Illinois by its work and improvement, and it is yet to be determined in Iowa whether that company can lawfully maintain its existing structure.

Mr. WORKS. There may be a question in that instance whether the State of Iowa is concerned or the private owner of the land along the stream. When I speak of the State of Iowa I include the citizens of the State as well who may own the land to the center of the stream or to high-water mark, as the case may be. I read further:

In fixing such conditions, or any of them, the Secretary of War shall also take into consideration the probable cost to such grantee of construction and maintenance and operation and the probable consumers' rate required to produce a reasonable return upon the investment required of such grantee—

I maintain that is a matter over which the Secretary of War has no jurisdiction and about which he has no concern whatever. The question what may be realized by the person who accepts the permit or grant is purely a State matter and under State control under the provisions of the Constitution. And further—

As between contesting applicants for a permit hereunder having the legal qualifications required by this act—

This authorizes the Secretary to determine not the question whether they have complied with the legal requirements of the laws of the State authorizing them to divert and use the water but whether they have the qualifications provided for in this act—and being equally well qualified to improve or develop waterways for the uses of interstate or foreign commerce, preference shall be given to that applicant which is best qualified to expedite and realize the maximum useful development of all the water resources of the region; and as between such contesting applicants which appear equally well qualified in such respect, then preference shall be given to that applicant which has first complied with the laws of the State or States in which the dam or diversion structure is to be constructed.

Now, that applies wholly to the question of the use of the water for purposes that are to be controlled by the State. The National Government has no concern about the qualifications of the applicants, so far as their ability to supply the water for these purposes is concerned. It is concerned only with respect to the navigation of the stream and nothing else.

I call attention now to section 5:

SEC. 5. That unless revoked for cause as provided in section 8 of this act the rights under any such permit shall continue for a period of 50 years from and after the date of the completing and putting into commercial operation of the initial installation required by the Secretary of War as provided in section 9 of this act, and after the expiration of said 50 years such rights shall continue until revoked for cause as provided in section 8 of this act or until terminated and compensation has been made to such grantee for its property as provided in section 6 of this act.

That gives the National Government the right to terminate the use of the water if it has been applied, for example, to irrigation, at the end of 50 years, and under the laws of the irrigated States the right that is procured for irrigation purposes is perpetual and becomes appurtenant to the land whenever it is applied to the land for purposes of irrigation.

This proposes to allow the Secretary of War to step in and limit the time when the waters shall be used and to deprive the State of the power to provide for the diversion of the water for a specific purpose for all time, which I think is not only unauthorized by the Constitution but it would be exceedingly unwise.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. It has the power to revoke for cause not in any manner connected with navigation.

Mr. WORKS. Certainly; there is no limitation at all. It is even a ilttle worse than that. It provides for the Government taking over the works that are constructed, not only those in the stream but the diversion works as well. It authorizes the Government to take over those works for its own uses and purposes. Section 6 provides:

SEC. 6. That at any time after the expiration of said 50 years the United States may terminate the rights hereunder granted upon the giving to the grantee of one year's notice in writing of such termination, and upon the taking over by the United States of all the property of the grantee dependent in whole or in part for its usefulness upon the rights hereunder granted which are necessary and appurtenant or acquired—and valuable or serviceable in the distribution of water, or in the generation, transmission, and distribution of power, and upon paying to the grantee the fair value of said property, together with the cost to the grantee of the lock or locks, or other aids to navigation, and all other capital expenditures, required by the United States, and assuming all contracts entered into by the grantee which have the approval of the duly constituted public authority having jurisdiction thereof.

That authorizes the Government not only to terminate the use of this water by the person who has received a permit and who has obligated himself to supply it for specific purpose, but the Government may terminate his right to supply the water or the power as the case may be and take it upon itself.

Now, what is going to be the result of that condition of things? Can the States regulate the rates to be charged by the United States when it becomes the owner of the plant and undertakes to perform the duties of a utility corporation? What control has the State over it under such circumstances as those?

That is precisely what this bill proposes to do, in the first instance, to take over the control of it in the hands of the permittee and finally to become the absolute owner of it and control it and supply the power or the water, as the case may be.

And further:

That in the valuation for rate-making purposes of the property of any such grantee there shall be included the cost to such grantee of the construction of the lock or locks, or other aids to navigation, and all other capital expenditures required by the United States, but no value shall be claimed or allowed for the rights hereby granted.

Let me turn to section 8, which provides:

SEC. 8. That any grantee who shall fail or refuse to comply with any of the provisions of this act or any of the conditions made a part of any permit issued hereunder or any regulation or lawful order of the Secretary of War, made in accordance with the provisions of this act, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor.

The very act of complying with the laws of the State might be a violation of the permit and the conditions imposed by the Secretary of War. There is a direct conflict between the laws of the State of California and the conditions that are allowed to be imposed in this bill by the Secretary of War. What are you going to do under those circumstances? If the permittee undertakes to comply with the permit, he may run afoul of the State law, and if he violates the State law his permit is subject to forfeiture, and he is liable to punishment. The whole bill, the whole scope, the whole purpose of the bill is to take over the rights and power of the States and vest them in the National Government, and there is no escaping from that construction of it.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. WORKS. I yield.

Mr. SHIELDS. I suggest to the Senator the clause he has just criticized, making it punishable to violate the orders and regulations of the Secretary of War, applies to the regulations and orders the Secretary of War to control pools above and below dams for navigation purposes, which is a matter Congress has paramount jurisdiction of. Its laws and regulations made under those laws are, of course, paramount to any State regulation on the subject.

Mr. WORKS. I wish I might agree with the Senator from Tennessee, but he is quite mistaken in his construction of the section. These conditions that are imposed are not confined to navigation or the protection of navigation at all. They go far beyond that, as I have already pointed out.

This general provision is that for the violation of any of those conditions or any of the orders that are made by the Secretary of War, if they affect simply the question of the taking or the distribution of the water, it shall be cause of forfeiture. I am sure that the Senator from Tennessee, learned as he is in the law, would not contend for any such thing as that.

It is provided, in addition to the penalties imposed—and in addition to said penalties the Attorney General may, on request of the Secretary of War, institute proper proceedings in equity in the district court of the United States in the district in which such structure or any of its accessory works are, in whole or in part, situated, for the purpose of having such violation stopped by injunction, mandamus, or other process.

Of course, if it were a question of interference with navigation, if the permittee were doing any act in violation of the conditions imposed by the Secretary of War that went to the question of navigation, this penalty would be entirely just and within the jurisdiction of Congress to enact, but if it relates not to the question of navigation, but to the supply of the water, that is quite another thing, and the Government of the United States has no authority whatever to deal with it.

I call attention also to section 9, which provides:

SEC. 9. That the grantee shall commence the construction of the dam and accessory works within two years from the date of the permit herein provided, and shall thereafter, in good faith and with due diligence, prosecute such construction, and shall, within such time as may be provided in the permit, complete and put in commercial operation such part of the ultimate development as the Secretary of War shall deem necessary to supply the reasonable needs of the then available market, and shall, from time to time thereafter, construct such portion of the balance of such ultimate development as said Secretary of War may direct and within the time specified by him so as to supply adequately the reasonable market demands until such ultimate development shall be completed—

And so forth.

Now, it will be seen, Mr. President, that in that case the authority to determine when the work shall commence and when it shall be completed is vested in the Secretary of War. I suppose there is not an irrigation State in the Union that does not have a statute providing when such work shall be done—when the work shall be commenced and when it shall be completed—in case of the diversion of water for power purposes or for irrigation. So in that respect the provisions of this bill come directly in conflict with the State statutes on that subject. I also call attention to section 10, which provides:

SEC. 10. The Secretary of War may lease to any applicant having the capacity of grantee as herein defined, and having complied with the laws of the State in which a dam is constructed or to be constructed by the United States, the right to utilize the surplus water power over and above that required for navigation at any navigation dam now or hereafter constructed, either with or without contribution by the applicant, and owned by the United States, and on such terms as may be deemed by the Secretary of War for the best interests of the United States.

There is a saving clause in that section which makes it necessary for the State to determine whether it is a proper case for the distribution of the water and there is a general provision in the bill, I may say, that it shall be subject to the provisions of the State laws in some respects; but the trouble about that is, that some of these provisions are diametrically opposed to the State laws. They can not be in conformity or subject to State laws. You must determine which one of them shall stand, because, as I shall show in a moment, they are directly opposed in their terms to the statutes of the States, and therefore one or the other of them must give way.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me, I wish to state that section 10 is almost entirely divorced from the remainder of the bill. It relates simply to cases where the Government has constructed a dam with its own funds, and to the right of the Government in that case to lease or sell the surplus power created as an incident thereto. The Supreme Court has decided that question in the Sault Ste. Marie case, to the effect that in cases of that kind the Federal Government has the right to dispose of such surplus power. So that is no longer an open question. Besides, if the Senator will observe the amendment, municipalities of a State are given the preference.

But what I particularly desire to call the Senator's attention to is the fact that the other provisions of the bill do not apply to that section as it is now framed.

Mr. WORKS. That may be conceded, Mr. President, and it is upon quite a different footing. I concede the Government has a right to sell and dispose of anything it actually owns. I do not know just how far the Supreme Court went in the decision to which the Senator from Minnesota refers, but there certainly is a good deal of question whether the water of a stream, although it may be developed as surplus water by the Government, is not subject to State control. I should doubt whether the Supreme Court has made any decision to the contrary. It may be the Government would have the right to dispose of and sell such power the same as any owner of it, but the question is how shall it be regulated and by whom in the distribution and the use of it, which is another matter.

Mr. President, having considered some of the provisions of this bill that I think are exceedingly objectionable, I should like to compare the provisions of the bill with the statutes of California to a certain extent, in order to show that the provisions of the bill are diametrically opposed to the provisions of the State statutes respecting the construction of the necessary work and the taking out and use of the water. Let me read from the California statute on that subject, which was passed, I think, only a couple of years ago. Section 16 of that statute provides:

SEC. 16. Every application for a permit to appropriate water shall set forth the name and post-office address of the applicant, the source of water supply, the nature and amount of the proposed use, the location and description of the proposed head works, ditch, canal, and other works; the proposed place of diversion and the place where it is intended to use the water; the time within which it is proposed to begin construction, the time required for completion of the construction, and the time for the complete application of the water to the proposed use. If for agricultural purposes, the applicant shall, besides the above general requirements, give the legal subdivisions of the land and the acreage to be irrigated, as near as may be; if for power purposes, it shall give, besides the general requirements prescribed above, the nature of the works by means of which the power is to be developed, the head and amount of water to be utilized, and the use to which the power is to be applied; if for storage in a reservoir, it shall give, in addition to the general requirements prescribed above, the height of dam, the capacity of the reservoir, and the use to be made of the impounded waters; if for municipal water supply, it shall give, besides the general requirements specified above, the present population to be served, and, as near as may be, the future requirements of the city; if for mining purposes, it shall give, in addition to the general requirements prescribed above, the nature and location of the mines to be served and the methods of supplying and utilizing the water. (Cal. Stat., 1913, pp. 1012, 1021.)

Unless that statute is complied with, there can not legally be a dam constructed in any of the streams of the State of California for the storage and supply of water for any purpose. The permit of the Secretary of War would not authorize it. If there should be an attempt to construct a dam and to take out the water, it could be enjoined by the State authorities on the ground that the laws of the State had not been complied with, and the permit granted by the Secretary of War would give no jurisdiction to enter upon the stream for any such purpose, would give no title to the water, and no authority to use it for any purpose. Further, the statute provides in section 19:

SEC. 19. Immediately upon completion, in accordance with law, the rules and regulations of the State water commission, and the terms of the permit, of the project under such application, the holder of a permit for the right to appropriate water shall report said completion to the State water commission. The said commission shall immediately thereafter cause to be made a full inspection and examination of the works constructed and shall determine whether the construction of said works is in conformity with law, the terms of the approved application, the rules and regulations of the State water commission, and the permit. The said water commission shall, if said determination is favorable to the applicant, issue a license which shall give the right to the diversion of such an amount of water and to the use thereof as may be necessary to fulfill the purpose of approved application. (Cal. Stat., 1913, pp. 1012, 1023.)

Under the law of California one desiring to divert water from a stream must make application to the water commission for a permit to construct the dam and the diversion works. That is simply a permit that is subject, when the work is all done, to the approval of the State authorities. The grantee has no rights in the stream; he has no rights under that permit, except to construct the necessary works, subject to approval. If when the works shall be constructed, when they are inspected by the water commission, and it is found that they are not in compliance with the rules of the commission or with the laws of the State, they are not approved, and the grantee has no right to divert the water, and even when that is all done and the works approved he acquires no title to the water. The title to the water rests in the State, and he is only given a license to use it after having complied with the law.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. WORKS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SHERMAN. I desire to ask the Senator from California in whom is the title to the water in a navigable stream when temporarily diverted, arrested, used, or transformed to any of the various purposes to which water is commonly applicable?

Mr. WORKS. The title to the water is always in the State. In some of the States it is made so by direct constitutional provision, providing that the title to the water shall be in the people of the State. I think that is so in Colorado; it may be so in Utah; I do not know how that is; but it is so in some of the States. I know it is not so in California.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. WORKS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WALSH. The feature of this matter, which the Senator from California is now discussing, is as important to my State as it is to his State, as he will appreciate. I want to inquire of the Senator whether it is his understanding that this bill purports to give the right to a person to divert water from a stream without his having complied with the State law?

Mr. WORKS. Not quite that, I will say to the Senator. I do not think that is expressly stated or perhaps intended, but that is the effect of it; that is to say, the conditions of the permit with the conditions authorized to be imposed by the Secretary of War are in direct conflict with the State statute, and to enforce them would deprive the State of the power to grant a license as the laws of the State provide.

Mr. WALSH. That is what I want to know, for if that is the case I am as interested in it as the Senator from California can possibly be. This gives the Secretary of War authority to permit the construction of the dam in a navigable stream, but I am utterly unable to understand how it can be contended that it is not then necessary for the man to get the right to divert the water by the laws of the State. Does the Senator understand that this bill would operate to deny or to obviate that necessity?

Mr. WORKS. Undoubtedly, if this bill becomes a law and is enforced.

Mr. WALSH. So that if a man were granted a permit under this bill to erect a dam in the Sacramento River, that would give him the right, in defiance of the law of California, to empty that stream and carry the water away?

Mr. WORKS. Oh, not at all.

Mr. WALSH. Then, he would still be obliged, would he not, to comply with the law of California, which entitles him to divert water from the stream?

Mr. WORKS. No; not under the provisions of this bill, I will say to the Senator, because he must comply with certain conditions imposed by the Secretary of War, which are in conflict with the laws of the State——

Mr. WALSH. If the Senator will permit me further——

Mr. WORKS. Pardon me a moment—and by that means, under the authority of this bill, a man can be prevented from entering upon a stream and taking out water as provided by the laws of the State. Either one or the other of these provisions must give way.

Mr. WALSH. I can not see why. The Secretary of War may give him a right to construct a dam across a stream, but if he does not acquire the right under the laws of the State to divert the water, he will not be able to make use of his permit. I call the attention of the Senator to page 7 of the bill, which provides as follows:

> As between contesting applicants for a permit hereunder having the legal qualifications required by this act, * * * preference shall be given to that applicant which has first complied with the laws of the State or States in which the dam or diversion structure is to be constructed.

And the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] has in conference with me suggested that that might be modified as follows:

> Preference shall be given to that applicant which has first acquired the right to divert the water of the stream by means of the dam to erect which the permit is sought and otherwise complied with the laws of the State.

If the bill were so amended, does the Senator then feel that it would encroach upon the rights of the State?

Mr. WORKS. Certainly.

Mr. SHIELDS. I should like to ask the Senator from Montana, in the same connection, to read from page 11 of the bill, line 22, or I will read it myself. It is as follows:

> And provided further, That nothing in this act shall be construed to prevent any State in which such dam with its appurtenant property is located, or in which such business is to be conducted, from making and enforcing any lawful regulations, with respect to the property or business of such grantee.

And then follows the provision that it shall be subject to State taxation.

Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator from California if it is his opinion, when the elaborate statutory provisions of California have been complied with by an applicant, he has the right to erect a dam without getting permission from Congress or some Federal agency to whom the power to give consent is delegated?

Mr. WORKS. Certainly not, if it is on a navigable stream; but the Secretary of War, as I have tried to explain, has no authority to refuse the permission except upon the ground that it interferes with navigation. That is the extent of his jurisdiction.

Mr. SHIELDS. I call the attention of the Senator to the fact that this bill only relates to navigable streams.

Mr. WORKS. Yes; but its provisions are quite contrary to the view of the Senator. It undertakes absolutely to control not only the original diversion of the water and the construction of the dams or whatever may be constructed for that purpose but also the regulation and control of the water after it is diverted. Now, the clause——

Mr. WALSH. Will the Senator permit me to interrupt him again?

Mr. WORKS. If the Senator will wait one moment until I complete the sentence, I will then yield to him. Conceding that the National Government has the right to control the situation so far as navigation is concerned, it has no right to follow the water after it is taken out of the stream and control its use or the rates which shall be paid for its use. Now I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WALSH. I want to make another inquiry of the Senator: Suppose the water of a stream is entirely appropriated now——

Mr. WORKS. I think most of the waters in my State are entirely appropriated.

Mr. WALSH. And much the same condition obtains in my State; but if a permit were granted under this bill, the permittee would be required, would he not, to acquire the rights of the prior appropriators before he could make use of his permit?

Mr. WORKS. No; I think not if this bill is to control. He would under the State law.

Mr. WALSH. Then, it is the opinion of the Senator that this bill would permit him to deprive the prior appropriators of their rights?

Mr. WORKS. Under this bill, if the applicant secured the necessary permit from the State and complied with the laws of the State, and, in addition to that, secured a permit from the Secretary of War, he might, of course, enter upon the stream and divert the water; but the Secretary of War can absolutely prevent his entry upon the stream or his taking out the water, no matter what the State does. That is the most serious objection to it.

Mr. WALSH. That is, simply by being invested with the power to issue the permit?

Mr. WORKS. By having the power to issue a permit for purposes that are not within his jurisdiction at all and imposing conditions not imposed by State law.

Mr. SHIELDS. Under the act of 1899, prohibiting the riparian proprietors or others from erecting structures in navigable streams, all riparian proprietors are now prohibited from making water-power development in navigable streams, however fully they may have complied with any State laws on the subject, simply because the power of Congress over navigable waters is paramount. No one now can make any improvement on his own property in a navigable stream without first getting the consent of Congress by special act. That is one of the chief objects of this bill, namely, to provide a method by which the consent of the Federal Government, through the Secretary of War, can be obtained speedily and without the confusion and embarrassment that usually follow the enactment of special laws upon the subject.

Mr. WORKS. Under the law as it exists to-day, of course, one must make application to the Secretary of War for a permit in order to construct a bridge or to erect a dam in a navigable stream, but the whole theory of that legislation is that the Secretary of War has the right to protect navigation. That is the object of it, and therefore he may refuse a permit to anyone where the effect of the structure will be to interfere with or obstruct navigation, but in this bill he is authorized to deal with an altogether different question, the question of the development of power, over which, I insist, he has no jurisdiction at all, and to impose conditions upon that basis, which is outside of his jurisdiction.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from California allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. WORKS. Certainly.

Mr. NELSON. I think the Senator is in error when he intimates that the Secretary of War can now, under any circumstances, grant a permit. I call the Senator's attention to the first sentence in the act of September 19, 1890, which reads as follows:

That the creation of any obstruction not affirmatively authorized by law to the navigable capacity of any waters in respect of which the United States has jurisdiction is hereby prohibited.

In other words, no dam can be erected in any navigable stream affecting its navigable capacity without the consent of Congress. The Secretary of War has no authority.

Mr. WORKS. That is precisely what I said. The National Government has full jurisdiction and control over navigable streams for navigable purposes. It has absolutely no control over the question of the diversion and use of water for other purposes.

There is another provision in this bill which gives the Secretary of War the right to determine when the work shall be commenced, when it shall be completed, and what additions shall be made to it, not for the purposes of navigation alone, but for the very purpose of supplying water for irrigation or power. Now let us see what the California statute provides on that subject:

SEC. 18. Actual construction work upon any project shall begin within such time after the date of the approval of the application as shall be specified in said approval, which time shall not be less than 60 days from date of said approval.

Under the statute of California the work must commence within 60 days; under the provisions of this bill it may be commenced in not less than two years from the time the permit is granted—and the construction of the work thereafter shall be prosecuted with due diligence in accordance with this act, the terms of the approved application, and the rules and regulations of said commission; and said work shall be completed in accordance with law, the rules and regulations of the State water commission, and the terms of the approved application, and within a period specified in the permit; but the period of completion specified in the permit may, for good cause shown, be extended by the State water commission. And if such work be not so commenced, prosecuted, and completed the water commission shall, after notice in writing and mailed in a sealed, postage-prepaid and registered letter addressed to the applicant at the address given in his application for a permit to appropriate water, and a hearing before the commission, revoke its approval of the application. But any applicant the approval of whose application shall have been thus revoked shall have the right to bring an action in the superior court of the county in which is situated the point of the proposed diversion of the water for a review of the order of the commission revoking said approval of the application.

Thus we have a complete system of regulation in the State intended to secure an early application of the water to a beneficial use. To this end work is required to be commenced in not less than 60 days, and prosecuted with due diligence, under rules and regulations prescribed by the commission; in other words, the State, admittedly the only authority having jurisdiction over the matter, provides that the work must commence within 60 days and be prosecuted with diligence, and be completed under rules and regulations prescribed by the water commission.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. WORKS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I should like to ask the Senator from California to point out specifically the provision of this bill which authorizes the diversion of water from a navigable stream?

Mr. WORKS. That is the object of the bill, principally.

Mr. BANKHEAD. To divert water from a navigable stream?

Mr. WORKS. Yes; of course.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I should like to have the Senator point out the provision to that effect.

Mr. WORKS. If water is diverted for power purposes, it goes back into the stream, but you can not generate power without a diversion of the water through pipes, or something of that sort.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Without diverting the water from the stream?

Mr. WORKS. Certainly.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I thought perhaps that the Senator was misled by the use of the term "diversion work." That term simply means that in the construction of the dam, the power house, and the machinery necessary to operate it such diversion structures as are necessary to turn the water from the pool onto the wheel may be erected. That is all that means. It has no reference whatever to diverting water from the main body of the stream.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, as a rule, water used for power purposes is not diverted from the stream except to return to it again; but that is entirely immaterial. It is a question of use, and I say whether or not you use the term "diversion" is quite immaterial.

Mr. BANKHEAD. One more word, and I am through. The Senator does not think for a moment, does he, that at one of these power sites the Secretary of War, under the provisions of this bill, will permit the water to be diverted from the main body of the stream so as to interfere with navigation?

Mr. WORKS. I do not know what the Secretary of War will do; I know what he may do under this bill.

Mr. BANKHEAD. He can not do that under the bill.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, if the Senator from California will allow me, I desire to ask him a question in order to get his view of the matter. The Sacramento River, for instance, in his State is the only navigable stream of which I know in California, and that is only navigable on the lower stretches of the stream. Now, would it not be possible under this bill for the Secretary of War, if he should decide it to be necessary for the navigation of the Sacramento River, to have such dams and locks built as he saw fit, notwithstanding the law of the State of California as to the diversion of water?

Mr. WORKS. Of course.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. He could do that?

Mr. WORKS. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Now, this being a navigable stream, if it were desired to place in it an obstruction for power purposes alone, would it be possible for the Secretary of War to grant on such a navigable stream as the Sacramento, for instance, a permit to build a dam for power purposes? If he would not have such power, then would it not follow that the State law would apply on the upper stretches of that river, notwithstanding the passage of this bill, whenever it came to an individual enterprise designed to create power on a navigable stream above the point of its present navigability? In that case, would not the State law as to power immediately apply even after the Secretary of War gave a permit under this bill?

I am extremely sympathetic with the Senator's care to prevent too much of this use of the State water by the Federal Government and too much domination over it. We agree in that thoroughly; but I was thinking that possibly he might give a permit, and then the State of California under its law would govern itself where it was nothing in the world but a pure question of the creation of power.

Mr. WORKS. Undoubtedly. In any case, however, if the structure was on a navigable stream, the permission of the Secretary of War would have to be obtained.

I have pointed out some of the objectionable provisions of the bill and their conflict with the laws of the State of California, which I have simply taken as an illustration. The same thing would apply to other States, though not necessarily to the same extent, because we have very minute and strict regulations with respect to the diversion and use of water in California. I think probably some of the other States have not gone quite so far, but they all have rules and regulations governing such use. Let me, in respect of the law of the case, call the attention of the Senate to the case of Escanaba Co. against Chicago, One hundred and seventh United States, page 678, which involved the right of the States to legislate respecting the use of navigable streams over which, for purposes of commerce between the States, the Federal Government has jurisdiction. In dealing with this question the court said:

The power vested in the General Government to regulate interstate and foreign commerce involves the control of the waters of the United States which are navigable in fact, so far as it may be necessary to insure their free navigation, when by themselves or their connection with other waters they form a continuous channel for commerce among the States or with foreign countries. * * *

But the States have full power to regulate within their limits matters of internal police, including in that general designation whatever will promote the peace, comfort, convenience, and prosperity of their people. This power embraces the construction of roads, canals, and bridges and the establishment of ferries, and it can generally be exercised more wisely by the States than by a distant authority. They are the first to see the importance of such means of internal communication and are more deeply concerned than others in their wise management. Illinois is more immediately affected by the bridges over the Chicago River and its branches than any other State and is more directly concerned for the prosperity of the city of Chicago, for the convenience and comfort of its inhabitants, and the growth of its commerce. And nowhere could the power to control the bridges in that city, their construction, form and strength, and the size of their draws and the manner and times of using them be better vested than with the State or the authorities of the city upon whom it has devolved that duty. When its power is exercised so as to unnecessarily obstruct the navigation of the river or its branches, Congress may interfere and remove the obstruction. If the power of the State and that of the Federal Government come in conflict, the latter must control and the former yield. This necessarily follows from the position given by the Constitution to legislation in pursuance of it as the supreme law of the land. But until Congress acts on the subject the power of the State over bridges across its navigable streams is plenary.

That may have been one of the reasons why Congress provided by law that before bridges should be constructed the permit or consent of the Secretary of War should be obtained; but it will be seen that the power of the National Government is strictly limited to the question of navigation. Further—

The doctrine declared in these several decisions is in accordance with the more general doctrine now firmly established—that the commercial power of Congress is exclusive of State authority only when the subjects upon which it is exercised are national in their character and admit and require uniformity of regulation affecting alike all the States. Upon such subjects only that authority can act which can speak for the whole country. Its nonaction is therefore a declaration that they shall remain free from all regulation.

Then, I want to refer to the case of Kansas against Colorado, which has been already referred to by other Senators, and some extracts read from it; but, as bearing upon the question I am now discussing, I want to call attention to some of the things that were said in the opinion in that case.

The case of Kansas against Colorado, Two hundred and sixth United States, 46, involved directly the power of the Federal Government to legislate respecting the irrigation of arid lands. It will no doubt be remembered that in that litigation, which was between two of the States, the United States sought to intervene and the Supreme Court held that it was not a proper party to the action, because it was not concerned in the use of the water. The question presented for decision is thus stated by the court:

Turning now to the controversy as here presented, it is whether Kansas has a right to the continuous flow of the waters of the Arkansas River, as that flow existed before any human interference therewith, or Colorado the right to appropriate the waters of that stream so as to prevent that continuous flow, or that the amount of the flow is subject to the superior authority and supervisory control of the United States. * * *

The primary question is, of course, of national control. For, if the Nation has a right to regulate the flow of the waters, we must inquire what it has done in the way of regulation. If it has done nothing, the further question will then arise, What are the respective rights of the two States in the absence of national regulation?

In discussing this question, as stated by the court, it was said:

Congress has, by virtue of the grant to it of power to regulate commerce "among the several States," extensive control over the highways, natural or artificial, upon which such commerce may be carried. It may prevent or remove obstructions in the natural waterways and preserve the navigability of those ways. * * *

That involves the question whether the reclamation of arid lands is one of the powers granted to the General Government. As heretofore stated, the constant declaration of this court from the beginning is that this Government is one of enumerated powers. "The Government, then, of the United States can claim no powers which are not granted to it by the Constitution, and the powers actually granted must be such as are expressly given or given by necessary implication." (Story, J., in Martin v. Hunter's Lessee, 1 Wheat., 304, 326.) "The Government of the United States is one of delegated, limited, and enumerated powers." (United States v. Harris, 106 U. S., 629, 635.)

Turning to the enumeration of the powers granted to Congress by the eighth section of the first article of the Constitution, it is enough to say that no one of them by any implication refers to the reclamation of arid lands. The last paragraph of the section, which authorizes Congress to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or office thereof, is not the delegation of a new and independent power, but simply provision for making effective the powers theretofore mentioned. * * *

We must look beyond section 8 for congressional authority over arid lands, and it is said to be found in the second paragraph of section 3 of Article IV, reading:

"The Congress shall have power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States, and nothing in this Constitution shall be so construed as to prejudice any claims of the United States or of any particular State."

It must be borne in mind that in this case the court is dealing with the question of the right of the Government to deal with arid land belonging to the Government. That is not the question now before the Senate. The question is as to the right of the Government to control and regulate the use of water for the irrigation of private lands, not the lands of the Government.

The full scope of this paragraph has never been definitely settled. Primarily, at least, it is a grant of power to the United States of control over its property. That is implied by the words "territory or other property." It is true it has been referred to in some decisions as granting political and legislative control over the Territories, as distinguished from the States of the Union. It is unnecessary in the present case to consider whether the language justifies this construction. Certainly we have no disposition to limit or qualify the expressions which have heretofore fallen from this court in respect thereto. But clearly it does not grant to Congress any legislative control over the States and must, so far as they are concerned, be limited to authority over the property belonging to the United States within their limits. Appreciating the force of this, counsel for the Government relies upon "the doctrine of sovereign and inherent power," adding, "I am aware that in advancing this doctrine I seem to challenge great decisions of the court, and I speak with deference." His argument runs substantially along this line: All legislative power must be vested in either the State or the National Government; no legislative powers belong to a State government other than those which affect solely the internal affairs of that State, consequently all powers which are national in their scope must be found vested in the Congress of the United States. But the proposition that there are legislative powers affecting the Nation as a whole which belong to, although not expressed in the grant of powers, is in direct conflict with the doctrine that this is a Government of enumerated powers. That this is such a Government clearly appears from the Constitution, independently of the amendments, for otherwise there would be an instrument granting specific things made operative to grant other and distinct things. This natural construction of the original body of the Constitution is made absolutely certain by the tenth amendment. This amendment, which was seemingly adopted with prescience of just such contention as the present, disclosed the widespread fear that the National Government might, under the pressure of a supposed general welfare, attempt to exercise powers which had not been granted. With equal determination, the framers intended that no such assumption should ever find justification in the organic act, and that if in the future further powers seemed necessary they should be granted by the people in the manner they had provided for amending that act. It reads, "The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution nor prohibited by it to the States are reserved to the States, respectively, or to the people * * *."

Mr. President, I have attempted to analyze this bill and to point out the provisions in it that I think are violations of the Constitution and of the rights of the States. There is a persistent effort just now by the Congress of the United States to take away from the State governments the powers that are vested in them by the Constitution and give them over to the National Government. You can see it exercised in various ways through the departments and through legislation that is being enacted, and this is one of the worst of the cases. It is one of the most important to the Western States. The waters that flow down their streams are the life of those States. Without them they would still be sheep pastures, instead of cultivated lands. I feel very strongly that this legislation is detrimental in many ways to the Western States. It is an attempt to usurp the power that rests in them to control the use of the water in which they are so greatly and so vitally interested.

It is for that reason that I have spent more time on this question than I otherwise would have done. If this were simply a question of the improvement of navigable streams, I should have no concern about it. If it were simply a provision authorizing the construction of dams in the streams for the purpose of developing power, I should not feel concerned about it, if only the power when developed, or the water when diverted for irrigation purposes, were left to the regulation and control of the States.

There is no reason why the Government should not lend its aid in the development of power. I make no objection to that. There is no reason why it should not permit the use of the navigable streams for purposes of that kind. No reason presents itself to my mind why the Government should not grant the right to construct dams and other structures in the streams for the very purpose of developing power, or even for the purpose of enabling the distribution of the water for irrigation purposes. But when the Government goes further than that, as it does in this bill, and attempts to determine when and under what circumstances the water may be diverted or used for such purposes, and when not, it is infringing upon the powers of the States.

Senators have looked rather lightly on this question, I think. They regard it as not a serious one, because of the fact that it is attempted, at least, to be confined to navigable streams. It would not be of any great importance in my State if it were confined to actually navigable streams. There is only one stream in the State of California that can be properly called a navigable stream, and that for only a part of the way. It is the principle that is involved in it that I am contending against.

I should not stand in the way of the passage of this bill by any means, if it were not for that attempt to reach out and take away from the States what belongs to them under the Constitution and vest it in the National Government. Not only is that the effect of this bill, but from its history I am perfectly satisfied that that is the prime object of it—to do that very thing. I have attempted to point out in what way it does conflict with the laws of my own State, and I think the laws of other States as well.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JAMES in the chair). Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. WORKS. I do.

Mr. SHERMAN. Before the Senator concludes his remarks, I should like to inquire his view with regard to this same attempted—and, as I consider, unwarranted—extension of the powers of the Government and increasing the reach of a certain department of the Government in relation to section 4, on page 8, which to me is a specific instance of the most obnoxious attempted usurpation of power. I will read the portion to which I refer:

When a grantee hereunder is a municipal corporation, or a political subdivision of a State, or a public-service agent of a State, or a public utility or service corporation, it may acquire the right to use or damage any lands or property—

Not alone on the public domain of the Government—

Any lands or property of others necessary to the construction, maintenance, or operation of any such dam or diversion structure or of the works appurtenant or accessory thereto by the exercise of the right of eminent domain in the district court of the United States for the district in which such land or other property may be located, or in the State courts.

All of these municipal corporations or utility corporations are State created, and have by the laws, whether they be of special origin or whether they originate under the general statutes of the State, certain enumerated charter powers that mark the limitation of their activities, wisely imposed in order that corporations may have only the powers intended to be granted by the people representing the legislatures of the several States. Among them are certain corporations vested with the power of eminent domain to condemn private property for the uses of corporations supposed to be in the main of a public or quasi-public character. This power to condemn creates the right to take, only upon the payment of compensation, it is true; but it is the exercise of a sovereign right, ordinarily not possessed by any State-created corporation.

A company organized for the sole purpose of generating electric power in many of the States has no right to condemn under the State-created powers. This section would confer upon a State-created corporation of limited powers by an act of Congress the right of eminent domain. It would be further obnoxious, would it not, by attempting to confer upon a State-created corporation by an act of Congress the right to condemn in a United States court your property or mine and take us into strange and foreign jurisdictions, whereas now such power does not exist?

I can not think Congress has the right or the constitutional power to attempt such a thing.

Mr. WORKS. No; I think that provision would be unconstitutional, and some others to which I have called attention.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. WORKS. I do.

Mr. SHIELDS. Will the Senator allow me to make a suggestion in answer to the proposition advanced by the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. WORKS. Certainly.

Mr. SHIELDS. I do not think the Senator from Illinois has read the entire section to which he objected.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me, as he is addressing himself to the Senator from Illinois, I will yield the floor.

Mr. SHERMAN. I wished to get the views of the Senator from Tennessee upon this one question.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, I wish to read the entire section criticized by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] on the subject of eminent domain. It is in these words:

When a grantee hereunder is a municipal corporation, or a political subdivision of a State, or a public-service agent of a State, or a public utility or service corporation, it may acquire the right to use or damage any lands or property of others necessary to the construction, maintenance, or operation of any such dam or diversion structure or of the works appurtenant or accessory thereto by the exercise of the right of eminent domain in the district court of the United States for the district in which such land or other property may be located, or in the State courts. The practice and procedure in any action or proceeding brought for that purpose in the district court of the United States shall conform as nearly as may be with the practice and procedure in similar actions or proceedings in the courts of the State where the property is situated.

I fully concur with the Senator from Illinois that ordinarily Congress can not vest powers in corporations of the several States, but there are exceptions to that rule. It was held in the case of Oregon Short Line Railway Co. against Schottowe, One hundred and sixty-second United States, that Congress could grant an additional franchise to State corporations.

Also, in the case of the Southern Pacific Railroad Co. against the United States, One hundred and eighty-third United States, it is said:

It is well settled that Congress has power to grant to a corporation created by a State additional franchises—at least, franchises of a similar nature.

Mr. President, corporations for the purpose of generating hydroelectricity for sale have been held in a large number of the States to be public utility companies. That was held by the Supreme Court of Tennessee in the case of Power Company against Webb, reported in One hundred and twenty-third Tennessee. Numerous courts of other States have so held. Other cases are cited in that case which support the holding there made.

But more recently the Supreme Court of the United States, in Mount Vernon-Woodberry Cotton Duck Co. against Alabama Interstate Power Co., a case coming up, I believe, by writ of error from the Supreme Court of Alabama, it was held that corporations of this kind are public utility companies; that they were incorporated for a public purpose and can exercise the power of eminent domain on the same principle that railroad corporations are authorized to exercise it.

The object of this provision was to authorize the corporation making the improvement to exercise the power of eminent domain in so far as the United States could exercise it if it was constructing the dam for navigation purposes. It is well settled that the United States has no power of eminent domain, generally speaking; there is no such power in the Constitution; but the power of eminent domain is an inherent power, a power of sovereignty vested in every government for governmental purposes. While Congress can not grant the power of eminent domain for any purpose whatever, other than a governmental purpose, it can always provide for its exercise to carry out any governmental purpose; and where it proposes to carry out that purpose through an agent, by a corporation created by it, or through a State corporation as an agent, it can grant it, and it can be exercised constitutionally, and it has been frequently done. Congress can either create a corporation to effect a Federal purpose, as in the case of the Panama Canal Corporation, or it can proceed directly to carry out that Federal purpose.

In this case it simply vests the power of eminent domain in these corporations as governmental agencies for improving the rivers for navigation. In my opinion Congress could not construct a dam in a river for power purposes solely, unless there was some further governmental purpose to be effected. I think under the power to raise and maintain armies it might build a dam and construct a factory for the purpose of generating hydroelectricity for the fixation of atmospheric nitrogen for the manufacture of explosives. But there is no such proposition in this bill. It provides solely for the governmental agency adopted for navigation purposes. Congress can adopt State laws or it can adopt State corporations wherever they come within a vested Federal power for the execution of a Federal power.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. SHIELDS. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. While the Senator is on that particular section I wish to ask him a question in relation to the provision giving to the corporation the right to exercise eminent domain, either in a United States court or in a State court. Does the Senator believe that we ought to retain in the provision the part of it relating to the United States court? Would it not be sufficient and would it not better meet the end to be desired, as the Senator from Illinois has so well suggested, to confine it to the State court? That would not in any way interfere with the constitutionality of the provision, would it?

Mr. SHIELDS. I do not think it would.

Mr. NORRIS. Would the Senator object seriously if an amendment were proposed, when the proper time came, to strike out, commencing at line 1, page 9, these words:

In the district court of the United States for the district in which such land or other property may be located, or—

So that it would read:

That this corporation may exercise the right of eminent domain in the State courts.

Mr. SHIELDS. I do not care to go into the matter now. When we reach it I shall do so. I have not the reasons fully in my mind for giving the Federal court jurisdiction to the extent which I have referred to in the remarks I have just made. When the bill was first prepared it did not have this clause, and I was personally opposed to giving the Federal court jurisdiction in any case; but on a discussion of the matter in committee I yielded that opinion and came to the conclusion that, considering the governmental purposes that were involved—the improvement of rivers for navigation—and some other reasons that were advanced in favor of it, I yielded my individual views and this clause was inserted by the committee.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to say to the Senator that I should like to have him present those reasons. As I look at it now, those words ought to be stricken out unless——

Mr. SHIELDS. I will say to the Senator that I will do it at a later time. We are discussing another amendment at this time.

Mr. NORRIS. I will not expect the Senator to do it now if he chooses to defer it.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I wish to understand more clearly the Senator's position with regard to the subject he was discussing a moment ago in response to the statement of the Senator from Illinois, for it is one of the things which has bothered me a good deal about the bill. I think it is true that the United States can confer upon a State corporation engaged in public work the right of eminent domain, provided the State corporation is executing a power which the Government could exercise.

Mr. SHIELDS. And in no other case, in my opinion.

Mr. CUMMINS. That is to say, if a State corporation proposes to build a series of dams and locks in a river not otherwise navigable for the purpose of making the river navigable, practically speaking, I have no doubt it could bestow upon that corporation the right of eminent domain, just as the Government itself could exercise that right if it were performing the work. But take a river that is not navigable, as we understand the term, a river which must be improved in order to be made of use in commerce. A State corporation is organized for the purpose of creating electric power. That is its only purpose. The Government has not decided to enter upon the stream for the purpose of making it navigable.

Does the Senator from Tennessee believe that under those circumstances the United States can give the State corporation the power of eminent domain even though the dam or dams which might be built would some time in the future be available in aid of navigation, when it was well known that the sole purposes of the corporation was to create power, and if the river is improved at all for navigable purposes it is only incidental? Does the Senator think that under those circumstances the State corporation is executing the power of the General Government?

Mr. SHIELDS. This brings up the question that we discussed an hour or two the other day as to what is a navigable stream. I do not understand that the criterion is whether the Government has improved the stream or not for navigation purposes. I do not think that has anything to do with it. The Government can not improve all the navigable waters or those which come within that definition, which are susceptible of improvement for navigation at one time, as we have recently found out by the defeat of the rivers and harbors bills in the two last sessions of Congress. In other words, it certainly will not do it. My opinion is that Congress can not vest in a corporation, Federal or State, the power to improve a stream that is not navigable. I think the sole jurisdiction of Congress over rivers is dependent upon the question of navigability. If the river is not navigable, then Congress has no power to improve it either directly or through an agent. If it is navigable it can do it directly or through an agent.

Now, as to what are navigable streams and what are not is a question of serious controversy. My own opinion is that only streams that can be navigated in the usual stages of the water for commercial purposes are navigable streams in the sense of the Constitution, and that the power of Congress ought to be limited to them.

Mr. CUMMINS. That, however, really assumes the very question that I was trying to elucidate. I understand perfectly how difficult it is for one to define the words "navigable waters" but, in a general way, I think we all know that there are certain streams which are capable of being used in their ordinary condition for the transportation of persons and property. There are certain other streams that can not be so used in their ordinary natural condition but in which flow enough water to furnish this essential for navigation, and in which the Government can create a navigable condition by either canalizing them or by locks and dams which will deepen the water in the beds of the streams. Although I do not commit myself to the proposition, I am assuming that a stream of the latter character is one of which Congress has jurisdiction.

Mr. SHIELDS. I understand that such has been the construction of the Constitution for many years.

Mr. CUMMINS. It is one which is navigable in that abstract or theoretical sense, and if the Government were to so decide it could under the commerce clause of the Constitution enter upon the work of improving it and making it usable in commerce. But now a public-utility corporation wants to put a dam in such a stream as that. It, of course, does not impede navigation; it does not obstruct navigation, for there is no navigation. There is no commerce upon it. It wants to build a dam in such a stream and that for the sole purpose of creating electric energy. Now, does the Senator think that with regard to such a stream under such circumstances the United States can bestow or give to such a corporation the power of eminent domain?

Mr. SHIELDS. I do, if it is a navigable stream. If it is held not to be a navigable stream I do not believe it could give it, and so at last we get back to the question of what is a navigable stream. In the United States against the Rio Grande Co. the court held it was a question of fact whether a stream is or is not navigable.

I will state to the Senator I would favor an additional section of the bill defining navigable streams. It is a difficult thing to legislate upon. It is a question for the courts. For many years, under permission of the States, the riparian proprietors could construct such structures or dams as they pleased. In 1890, and subsequently in 1899, statutes were passed which changed the rule and prohibited riparian proprietors or anyone else from placing obstructions to navigation in streams without the consent of Congress.

I think Congress might modify those acts by providing that they shall not apply to a stream of the character the Senator has just described, and I think that would be a very wholesome statute.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am very glad to hear the Senator from Tennessee state his views upon that subject. I have such an amendment and I intend to offer it at the proper time. But the question that we are discussing here is rather narrower than the definition of those streams to which the bill shall apply. I have been a little surprised with some of the declarations that have been made here this afternoon with regard to the power of the General Government over streams of the character I have described. I have heard it said that without any act of Congress at all it would be unlawful for a riparian owner to enter upon a stream of that sort and obstruct it or impede its flow in any way, and upon that theory is built the proposition that the Government ought to acquire a revenue from these projects, because it has something to grant. I do not see the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] in the Chamber at this moment, but it is to his view of the subject that I am just now referring.

Mr. SHIELDS. The Senator did not hear me expressing any such opinions.

Mr. CUMMINS. It is my opinion that with regard to a stream which is only potentially navigable, that can not be used without improvement, the Government has no power to invest a State corporation with the privileges of eminent domain until it has entered upon the project of improving the stream, and unless the structure, whatever it may be, is a part of the project for making a stream actually usable in interstate or foreign commerce. I have not been able to satisfy myself that a great many of the powers that are attempted to be granted in the bill to the grantee of the Federal Government can be constitutionally conferred. We all realize that this is not a bill to encourage the improvement of rivers for navigation. The navigation is a mere constitutional peg upon which those who are trying to encourage the development of water power hang the measure. I am not objecting to that, because——

Mr. SHIELDS. The Senator realizes that that is the only possible ground on which Congress has any right to legislate upon the subject—that is, the improvement of navigation.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am not quite prepared to grant that. I think there is another. Of course it arises from the same clause in the Constitution. The distribution of electric power between the States is just as legitimate a subject of regulation under the commerce clause of the Constitution as is the regulation of a railway or the improvement of a river. There is no difference between the two.

Mr. SHIELDS. Unquestionably the distribution of electric power between the States is an interstate purpose and is in the control of the State.

Mr. CUMMINS. If it is manufactured for purposes of distribution among the States, it is within the commerce clause of the Constitution, precisely as all other factories are. The antitrust law would be a very meager and a very inadequate law if it did not reach the production for distribution as well as distribution itself. I know that in the old case, the Knight case, that distinction was sought to be made, but the decision, if not expressly overruled, has been abandoned a long time ago.

The difficulty that the Senator from Tennessee undoubtedly finds in the composition of this bill is that instead of confining it to the distribution of power, as between the States, he is attempting to control the distribution of the power in the States, simply because it is generated in a stream which is theoretically or abstractly navigable. It seems to me that is an effort that is bound to meet with great difficulty.

Mr. SHIELDS. I hope the Senator will not insist that that is my position.

Mr. CUMMINS. I doubt if the Senator will be successful in overcoming the obstacles that are in his way.

Mr. SHIELDS. I say most emphatically I do not believe the bill applies to streams merely theoretically navigable, but it has to be navigable in fact, and in no other sense will the bill apply to a stream.

Mr. CUMMINS. But the Senator from Tennessee agrees with me that a stream in which not a boat has sailed in 50 years, over which no business whatever is done in a commercial way, is a navigable stream, provided there is enough water flowing between the banks to bear or carry commerce, and provided the banks are of that description that will enable the Government to plant a dam in the stream and thus make it possible for boats to ply upon it. Now, that, according to the view of the War Department, is a navigable stream, because the War Department has already in my own State declared that one such stream as I have described is navigable in the law, although for more than half a century there has not been a boat on it larger than a skiff or a pleasure motor.

I had hoped that before the bill had reached a final conclusion it would be bottomed upon a foundation which is secure and safe and that when we attempted to regulate electric power or to encourage the development of electric power we would put our efforts upon the only safe, and, as I think, the only honest, foundation, namely, our authority to regulate the distribution of such power among the States, and not upon the power to regulate or to provide for the navigation of streams. I intend to take the subject up at a later time in connection with my amendment and to discuss it from that standpoint.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, this discussion seems to me to be a good deal academic, but there is one fact we must not lose sight of. If the Federal Government has no jurisdiction of the tributaries and feeders of a stream, the portions of a stream that are not navigable, in fact, at the moment, it would follow, if you carry that out to its legitimate conclusion, that each State could dam up the sources of the river and thereby cut off the water supply. Suppose that all the streams that flow into the Mississippi River from the Falls of St. Anthony down, the Minnesota River, the Des Moines River, the Wisconsin River—I can not name all of them, but in most of them there is in fact no navigation—if the Federal Government were cut off from all power over those tributary streams there would be cut off the water supply to that great navigable river, the Mississippi. Hence the Supreme Court in the Rio Grande case has properly said that the jurisdiction of the Federal Government not only extends to those portions of the stream that are in fact navigable, but that it extends also to those portions of the stream beyond that, to the little feeders.

There is another practical question to which I wish to call the Senator's attention, and that is this: Suppose the Senator can get a declaration that the Des Moines River is not a navigable river—suppose he cuts that off entirely—the practical result would be that capital would not invest in building dams there, knowing that ultimately the Federal Government would have jurisdiction over that stream.

We are confronted with this situation, Mr. President. For years there has been an effort to build dams for the purposes of navigation and of creating power throughout the country. Matters have been at a standstill, because of the failure of Congress to enact any legislation on the subject. We have had a law on our statute books that has proven a complete embargo to work of that kind, and I will call attention especially to the language of that law. It provides—

That the creation of any obstruction not affirmatively authorized by law to the navigable capacity of any waters in respect to which the United States has jurisdiction is hereby prohibited.

It does not say "navigable streams," but it says any structures relating to the "navigable capacity of any waters" of the United States. That is the act of 1890, which has been in force ever since. In the face of that act, without authority from Congress or without authority from the War Department under some general law of Congress, naturally water-power development would not go on.

I want to reply to the constitutional feature of the argument of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS]. He said we could only bolster this up on the question of navigation. The paragraph of the Constitution under which we exercise this power is what is commonly called the commerce clause. It does not use the term "navigation." A dam erected in a river under modern appliances may not only serve to create a pool of water for ships or boats to navigate, but that same dam may serve to create power to propel the boats. Who can say that that power exercised in propelling boats that navigate on a stream does not come under the interstate-commerce power?

Our railroads are now talking in many instances—and in some they have carried it out—of applying electrical power, instead of steam generated by coal, to the operation of railroad trains. Suppose our steamboats resort to that same method of propulsion and suppose the Government creates the power dams, either itself or through its agents, and the dams not only create necessary water in which boats may float, but also furnish power to operate such boats, how can you make any distinction, under the interstate-commerce clause of the Constitution, between the water in which the boat floats and the power that is furnished to propel that boat in the stream?

So the power under the interstate-commerce clause—for it is much broader than the Senator from Iowa seems to think if he would limit it simply to the matter of floating a vessel or to what is commonly termed "navigation"—would include not only the water to float the ship, but the power to propel it; and one would be as much under the interstate-commerce clause of the Constitution, in my opinion, as would the other.

The time may come, Mr. President, when the steamboats that are plying on the Mississippi River from the Gulf clear up to the head of navigation at St. Paul, or between St. Paul and Minneapolis, will be run by electrical power, instead of being run by steam, as they now are. If that electrical power is furnished by the agency of the Government, why is not that as much under the interstate-commerce clause of the Constitution as is the building of wing dams along a river? In the building of wing dams we are spending millions of dollars on the Mississippi River to make it navigable, to make the water high enough to float boats. Have we not the same right under the same authority to create the power that will move the boats? Is not that a part of interstate commerce?

I can sympathize with the Senator from Iowa in his desire to have, for instance, the Des Moines River legislated upon in such a manner that it would not be considered a navigable stream; but he would find, if he secured such legislation, that he would be confronted by a practical proposition, and that is this: Nowadays it takes millions instead of thousands of dollars to erect a dam for electrical and navigation purposes combined. Who, I ask him, in the face of the decisions of the Supreme Court and of the provisions of the Constitution of the United States, will want to invest their millions of dollars in building big dams on the Des Moines River without the consent, either directly or indirectly, of Congress? Has the Senator ever thought of that question?

Mr. CUMMINS and Mr. SHERMAN addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield, and to whom?

Mr. NELSON. I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I have thought quite a great deal on that subject, but the Senator from Minnesota has failed, I think, to understand my position. I do not doubt the authority of Congress over streams that are tributary to the Mississippi River, and I would be very slow to withdraw that power if I could do it. The Mississippi River is a navigable stream—practically navigable. It must be supplied with water, and I agree with the Senator from Minnesota that the power of the Federal Government extends to the source of that water, wherever it may be, for the purpose of preventing its diversion so that the navigability of the Mississippi River might be impaired.

I agree also as to the illustration that the Des Moines River is a navigable stream under the decisions of the Supreme Court, and I would not have it otherwise. I am as anxious as anyone who lives in that locality can be that at some time or other the Government shall undertake to make the abstract navigability of the river a concrete fact. I do not expect that will be done in the near future, but I hope it will be done at some time.

Mr. NELSON. May I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. CUMMINS. Certainly.

Mr. NELSON. Is it not true that many years ago the Government of the United States, at the instance of the State authorities of Iowa or of the Territorial authorities—it may go back to that—gave to the Territory or to the State of Iowa a considerable land grant to improve the navigation of the Des Moines River?

Mr. CUMMINS. Unfortunately that is true. It is one of the instances of wasteful prodigality on the part of the Government. I think it was about 1850 that the Government gave to the State of Iowa a very large and valuable body of land to aid in the improvement of the Des Moines River. In some way—I need not particularize—that land passed into the hands of private owners; the river was not improved; the Federal Government lost almost an empire of fertile land; and the people of Iowa acquired nothing whatsoever.

Mr. NELSON. May I ask the Senator another question?

Mr. CUMMINS. Certainly.

Mr. NELSON. Is it not true that the grant ran to the State of Iowa, and that the State of Iowa conferred it upon a corporation that was to improve the river?

Mr. CUMMINS. That is also true.

Mr. NELSON. Then, if there was any negligence in the matter, it was the negligence of the State of Iowa in conferring the land grant on a corporation that did not carry out the purposes of the Government.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I have not attempted to justify the State of Iowa. This happened in those days when land seemed to be of no value, and it was given, not only by the National Government but by the State, to every person or corporation who desired it; but, at any rate, the river was not improved. Two or three dams were built in the river, but nothing else was done. After that time Congress, by a deliberate act, declared the river not navigable. After the lands were lost and the improvement of the river seemed impossible, Congress declared the river nonnavigable. It remained in that situation for very many years. Then a very worthy Member of the other House conceived that it would be helpful if the river were again surveyed by the Government to ascertain whether or not it could be improved. A bill was passed for that purpose. It was one of many items in an old river and harbor appropriation bill. The Government sent its engineers to carefully survey the river over a distance of 200 miles, probably. The engineers reported that there was water enough there to make a navigable river, and that there were banks there within which water could be confined; but the board decided that there were so many other rivers in the country of more value to commerce that the improvement of this river could not be recommended; and there the matter rests. While I hope that the river may be utilized, I have no hope that it will be done in any short period.

Now see where this bill leaves us? The river is not one in which great enterprises can be founded. No large amount of power can be developed at any particular place, and, therefore, if the river, pending its development for navigation, is ever to be used for the purpose of creating power, it must be through small enterprises—community enterprises, if you please.

A man here wants to build a dam for the purpose of furnishing power for a grist mill, or a man there wants to dam the river for the purpose of furnishing power for a woolen mill; the authorities of the city in which I live want to dam the river for the purpose of furnishing light and power to the city; but, in order to secure the privilege of damming this river, which in its present condition is purely private in the sense in which we are using the term "public," there being no public lands on either side of it and no public interests connected with it, these little enterprises, capitalized at home, which do not ask credit in the great money centers of the world, must come to the Secretary of War and lay before him their plans for a proposed dam to accomplish their specific purposes. They hesitate about doing that, because the Secretary of War seems to them very far away, and he is surrounded by obstacles which are difficult to overcome. I am not disparaging or criticizing any particular Secretary of War, but the people of a little community out in Iowa hardly know how to reach the Secretary of War through the cordon of officers and employees who are always about him and who constantly surround him. They bring their plans to the Secretary of War, if they finally penetrate to the council of engineers. Their plans are such as will provide for their needs. They have no idea of furnishing a great community with light or power, and it is quite probable that the community as a whole is not interested in these enterprises. The Secretary of War says to them—I am paraphrasing what he could say under this bill—"This river which you are about to dam may 500 years hence become valuable in commerce, or 50 years hence it may be that the Government will desire to build dams along its course, and in that way create pools which can be used by boats for the transportation of persons and property"——

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. CUMMINS. In just a moment I will yield to the Senator—"and, therefore, when you are building this dam you must so build it that it will become a part, and a proper part, of the scheme of development for navigation"; which is so far in the future that no one can visualize it and make it concrete. Now I yield to the Senator.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, it seems to me that the trouble with the Senator from Iowa in this matter—I concede the situation he describes—is in charging it to this bill. The difficulty in connection with the conditions which he describes is found in the act of September 9, 1890. That is what restrains the War Department. In the pending bill we place no such restrictions as are found in that act. There is nothing in this bill that forbids the construction of dams in navigable waters without the consent of the Secretary of War. That inhibition is in the act to which I have referred, and therefore if there is any error or mistake in the matter of embargo on dam construction, it can not be charged to this bill; but it must be charged to the act of September 9, 1890, from which I have quoted. Unless that law is changed or repealed, the passage of this bill will not affect that situation one way or the other.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator is partly right. The failure of this bill to pass would not remove the trouble which we now experience; but this bill is intended to establish a permanent policy with regard to navigable streams. The old act necessarily disappears with the passage of this bill, because, in the first place, we authorize the structures to be placed in those streams, with the approval of the Secretary of War, and all the legislation which has preceded this measure will be repealed, and necessarily so, because it can not stand in connection with the bill which we are now considering.

Let me suggest an instance of how the old law worked. A year or two ago I had occasion to confer with the Secretary of War with regard to a dam in the Des Moines River at Ottumwa, a city of from 25,000 to 30,000 people. Forty years ago, without authority from anybody, when it was not dreamed that the Federal Government had any relation whatever to a dam in the Des Moines River, there was a dam built across the river at Ottumwa. It was built to furnish power to the mills that were located at that point. Four or five years ago—six years ago, possibly—the city of Ottumwa became the owner of the dam. The pool above it furnished the city with water for supplying the needs of its people, and the power generated furnished the electricity with which the city was lighted, and such power as the city needed in connection with its water plant. The dam had grown old, and there was great danger that it would be swept away with the next high water. The city of Ottumwa wanted to reconstruct the dam, and proceeded with an election authorizing the municipality to issue bonds for that purpose and to enter into a contract for the rebuilding of the dam, when the Government interfered and said it could not be done. I took the matter up with the Secretary of War, insisting that this was not a navigable river in the sense in which those words are used in the statute. I then went to the Attorney General, but both of these Federal officers held that, although this river, as I have heretofore remarked, had not borne a single pound of commerce and trade for more than 50 years, it was nevertheless a navigable stream. They did not say that the water of the river could not be diverted so as to destroy the flow in the Mississippi River, into which it empties. Their position was that the river was navigable; that it was navigable under the definition of the Supreme Court of the United States, and that therefore any attempt on the part of the city of Ottumwa to strengthen or change the dam, which was absolutely necessary for a supply of water and of power, would be a violation of the law, and that they must, in the exercise of their duties, bring a suit for injunction to restrain any such change.

Of course this measure did not bring about that condition. I agree to that; but we are here proposing a condition under which, if that instance were to occur again, the city of Ottumwa must come to the Secretary of War and put before him the plans for the building of this dam, and then must build the dam of the height and the character that would be required if it were part of a great project for making the river navigable.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. CUMMINS. Yes.

Mr. NELSON. With all due respect, I think the Senator from Iowa misapprehends the scope of this bill in the respect to which he refers. While it authorizes the Secretary of War to grant permits to build dams over navigable waters of the United States, there is no prohibition in the bill such as there is in the act which I have cited, nor is there anything that requires anybody to go to the Secretary of War before building a dam. It is simply voluntary. The act to which I have referred was cited in the Rio Grande case; and, if the Senator will examine that decision, as I presume he has done already——

Mr. CUMMINS. I am quite familiar with it.

Mr. NELSON. The Senator is aware of the fact, then, that the Supreme Court based its decision upon that act. It cited that act in its opinion, and it is because of that act that the War Department and the Attorney General made the ruling to which the Senator has referred. Now, if that act should be repealed, that question could not arise, because the question of navigability would be an open question before the War Department. There would be no inhibition. I call the attention of the Senator to the broad character of the act of 1890. It does not use the term "navigable stream" or "navigable waters"; it uses the term "the navigable capacity of any stream"; it uses that extremely comprehensive language.

I concede that if this act were repealed there would be no impediment in the case in Iowa to which the Senator refers.

Mr. CUMMINS. It certainly is true that the position of the Secretary of War and the Attorney General in the case to which I referred was taken under the act a part of which the Senator from Minnesota has just read; but I understand the bill now before us is intended to take the place of the old act. It certainly will, and it establishes a policy which I may assume will continue for years with regard to navigable streams.

Mr. NELSON. If the Senator will allow me, I should like to say a word in that connection. I do not want to interrupt him if it is disagreeable.

Mr. CUMMINS. No; not at all.

Mr. NELSON. It is not so much the purpose of the pending bill to change this situation as it is to remove the embargo as it exists to-day. Under the act that I have cited in the Rio Grande case, no dam can be built anywhere without an act of Congress. The primary purpose of this bill is to provide some method by which people can build these dams without coming to Congress in every instance. That is the primary purpose of it. Unless you repeal the act that is cited in the Rio Grande case, the embargo would continue as to every case except where the War Department gave you a permit. You would be in the same fix that you are to-day.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not believe that the old act will be generally in force after the passage of this one, nor do I agree with the Senator from Minnesota that the words "navigable capacity" would have made any difference whatever in the instance to which I referred, because there was no suggestion of diminishing the flow of water. But if the Senator from Minnesota will look at the first section of this bill—he is familiar with it, of course—he will see that it is in and of itself an authority to construct dams in navigable waters, subject to the approval of the Secretary of War. That will repeal the former act that forbids constructions in navigable waters. Is that not true?

Mr. NELSON. If the Senator will allow me, it only repeals it in those instances where the right is granted to build a dam. Of course, in those cases it operates as a repeal to that extent, but in all other cases the statute remains.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not think there could be any other cases than those to which the present bill would refer.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, I suggest to the Senator that this bill fixes the conditions upon which a permit of that kind can be issued, and it seems to me it is exclusive. It could not be granted without complying with that provision of the statute.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think that is true, and I think the Senator from Tennessee has practically so stated more than once during the course of this debate. I am in favor of granting permits to persons who desire to build dams in streams that are in fact navigable, as we in a common-sense way understand that word, subject to the approval of the Secretary of War. I think that is right, and I think it would give tremendous stability and strength to these enterprises if the person to whom the permit is issued shall have reasonable assurance that he may enjoy the privilege for a considerable period of time.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. SHERMAN. While I have been very much interested in the development of the idea, I have not heard explained satisfactorily to me this granting of power to a State-created corporation, and I want to ask the Senator if before he yields the floor he will not elaborate somewhat on the explanation.

A great many States, either by special acts or by general incorporation acts, enable a certain association of men to become incorporated. Some of the corporations so created are vested with the power to condemn private property. Upon paying compensation they enter upon it and take it for their purposes. Other corporations engaged in business of as much moment and employing as much capital for the prosecution of the business are by the general policy expressed in these acts of the States denied the power of eminent domain. Does the Senator from Iowa or does the Senator from Tennessee think that this is an enabling act, so as to confer the power of eminent domain upon a State-created corporation that does not now possess it?

That is one inquiry. Another inquiry, which grows out of another section of the pending bill, is this: I propound them both at this time because I do not want to break in on the time of another Senator.

If, on one of these navigable streams, taking advantage of the water power, electricity is generated, under one section the power to regulate prices is taken from the State, in whatever way it exercises it, whether by the legislature or whether by a commission. I want to make this inquiry—and this is not an academic question, but a practical one. I take electricity through a wire and charge a storage battery to the extent of some 50 horsepower—if a battery of that capacity can be manufactured, and if not now, it will be—in the State of Iowa, on the Cooper Dam, over at the Keokuk end. I carry the charged battery to St. Louis and sell it in another State. My question is whether Congress can regulate the price at which I sell the electricity that goes into the battery; and I also propound the further inquiry, if you can not regulate it, why can you regulate the electricity carried over a wire and delivered to another State?

I do not think electric power differs from any other merchandise. It is merchandise, and where that merchandise is transferred from one State to another you can regulate the carrier transferring it. You can regulate anything that relates to the public service, except the price.

Mr. SHIELDS. I understand the Senator's proposition is that the power is a commodity.

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes; in the sense that I am using it, where it is stored in a battery and transferred.

Mr. SHIELDS. The generation of it is the manufacture of it, but when it is generated it becomes a commodity. The Federal Government can regulate the transportation of it from State to State, but the power to regulate its price and thus interfere with the freedom of contract is another question.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Government can not fix the price through an act of Congress on the merits of it any more than we would undertake to fix the price of boots or shoes manufactured in one place and transported over a State line into another.

Mr. SHIELDS. A shoe factory was in my mind. Can Congress regulate the price of shoes because they enter into interstate commerce? That is the Senator's proposition, is it not?

Mr. SHERMAN. Not necessarily.

Mr. SHIELDS. The same suggestion had occurred to me—whether or not the provision in the bill that the Interstate Commerce Commission could fix the price of the electricity or of the power when it entered into interstate commerce was valid, because it was not regulating the transportation of it but regulating the price, just the same as where you manufacture a thrashing machine in your State and ship it into another State and sell it. The mere fact that an article of commerce enters into interstate commerce does not give the Congress jurisdiction to regulate the price of it.

I think I appreciate the suggestion, and it had occurred to me; but I will suggest to the Senator from Illinois that here is the difficulty in that: This is a public-utility company. At common law the price of any commodity that affected the public interest generally—say bread, for instance—could be regulated, and it was frequently done by act of Parliament. The size of the loaves was regulated, although that comes under a different power; but the price of articles of food——

Mr. CUMMINS. The right to regulate the price of a loaf of bread would not come under the interstate-commerce power.

Mr. SHIELDS. No; I am speaking now of acts of Parliament. I say there were acts of Parliament to that effect, but they did not have such a Constitution as ours, and I do not think that would be a valid law in this country. Of course that would be a police measure and would come within the municipal control of the States; but Congress has no such power as that. Whether or not Congress has the right to regulate the price of this commodity, merely because it enters into interstate commerce, does present a question; and the only ground on which it can do so would be the ground that the power is generated by a public-utility company over which the Government has police powers in interstate commerce.

Mr. POINDEXTER and Mr. SHERMAN addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. To whom does the Senator from Iowa yield?

Mr. SHERMAN. I wanted to complete the series of inquiries, so that the Senator can take them all at once.

Mr. CUMMINS. Very well; I yield first to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. SHERMAN. If we enter upon a series of attempts here to regulate prices, where will it end? Heat can be generated from electricity, and we might transmit heat for various purposes over a State line. If we enter upon a series of attempts here to make prices, when will we complete our schedules? In other words, are we not invading a legitimate department of State activity, and, as the Senator from California says, attempting to transfer a vast mass of local powers to a department? In other words, is it not an absorption by the department of a great many powers that are local in character?

Mr. NELSON and Mr. SHIELDS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. To whom does the Senator from Iowa yield?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. NELSON. With the permission of the Senator from Iowa, I want to say to the Senator from Illinois that the principle that governed in this case was established by the Supreme Court of the United States as early as the case of Munn against Illinois, in which the Chief Justice said that wherever an employment or a service was charged with a public duty it was amenable to public control; and the court applied the rule in that case to the warehouses and elevators in the city of Chicago storing grain. It seems to me the principle of that case is broad enough to cover cases of the kind referred to here.

Mr. SHERMAN. The very charge there for a warehouse service was a schedule of prices created by an act of the Illinois General Assembly, and all the Supreme Court did in the case cited was to hold that that act was constitutional; that it was a regulation of a public utility calling for a proper exercise of legislative power.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. POINDEXTER. It seems to me that to say that it is a public utility hardly meets the point made by the Senator from Illinois. Of course public utilities are subject to public regulation; but the question that the Senator raises is, What jurisdiction is to do the regulating? Is it the State or the Federal Government?

There is no jurisdiction in the Federal Government, as I understand, to regulate a matter merely because it is a public utility. It might be a public utility without having any aspects of interstate commerce at all; and, as I understand the inquiry of the Senator from Illinois, where would you find under the Federal Constitution the power of Congress to act in that case?

It is not proposed in this bill that Congress or any agency of the Federal Government should have any control or any regulatory power unless the product enters into interstate commerce. The Senator, however, says it is a commodity. Of course, if it is a commodity, disassociated from its passing or exchange from one State to another, the Federal Government would have no power to regulate it; but it seems to me it is an entirely different proposition from that. It is not simply a commodity. "Juice," as it is called, electric power, may be regarded in some senses as a commodity; but in the sense in which this bill deals with it it is an agency.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. POINDEXTER. It is an agency which is continuously in motion from one State to another. The company engaged in handling it is constantly engaged in transmitting it from one State to another. It is impossible to separate the transmission from the production and the consumption. It is one continuous act. It is a current.

Mr. SHIELDS. I will say to the Senator that I found difficulty in separating the two. The question arose in preparing the bill.

Mr. POINDEXTER. It seems to me that it is more in the nature of an agency of commerce, such as a railroad train would be that passes from one State to another.

Mr. CUMMINS. If I may answer first what the Senator from Washington has said, I think he is in error with regard to the source of the power. The power to control or regulate in this bill is not based upon the fact that it may be interstate commerce. It grows out of the fact that the power was generated in a navigable river or stream. I think the two things are very widely separated.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I agree that Congress would have power to regulate the price because it grows out of a plant established in a navigable stream under a franchise of the Federal Government. Most of the advocates of this bill take a different view, however. They have placed it upon the power to regulate interstate commerce, and they have expressly left the regulation of the service, the charges, and the rates to the State authorities, except in those cases where it does enter into interstate commerce.

Mr. CUMMINS. Answering the Senator from Illinois, I have no hesitation in saying that the General Government can clothe a State corporation with the power of eminent domain to carry out a Federal function; but it can not clothe a State corporation with the power of eminent domain unless it is to execute some power that the Government itself might appropriately exercise.

The Senator's second question is a very difficult one, and no human being can answer it satisfactorily. We do not know in what classification electric power will finally fall. If the Cooper plant at Keokuk were to charge an electric battery and separate it from its connection with the machinery and then load that battery upon a train and transport it to St. Louis, I should be very slow to insist that we could fix the price of the current that charged the battery under our authority to regulate commerce among the States. But if instead of converting it into a commodity of that sort it were to run the current over a transmission line to St. Louis, so that the whole operation was a continuous one, I am inclined to think that it would be interstate commerce, and that the whole performance could be regulated by Congress. Even then I am not saying that Congress could fix the price of the service. That depends upon an entirely different proposition, because you would have to establish an analogy between the electric-producing plant, the line that connected it with the receiving end, and a railroad train or a railroad journey in order to reach that conclusion.

We have not yet, at least, determined that Congress can fix the price of goods that are to be transported from one State to another. We may come to that point at some time, but we have not yet reached it.

All of this, however, is very far from the point I was endeavoring to make, which is that with regard to streams that are not usable in commerce, and which must be improved in order that they may be used in commerce, it is almost a deception to insist that we are providing in this bill for an improvement in navigation. It is almost a fraud upon the Constitution itself to say that we can, or that we ought to, require these dams to be built in a way that will at some far-distant time facilitate or aid navigation, when we know that we are simply trying to encourage the use of the streams for the production of power. My view of the matter is that the latter streams not used now for navigation, and can not be used for navigation without improvement, ought to be put in an entirely different class and treated in an entirely different way.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. JONES. I agree, I think, with the Senator on that proposition, but it occurred to me that he misapprehended the effect upon the law of 1890 in the suggestion he made a while ago that the passage of this bill will do away with that law. I do not think it will. The law of 1890 reads as follows:

That the creation of any obstruction not affirmatively authorized by law to the navigable capacity of any waters in respect of which the United States has jurisdiction is hereby prohibited.

Every permit granted under this bill for the construction of a dam would be an obstruction affirmatively authorized by law; so that the act of 1890 will continue in force with the passage of this bill. What I wanted to inquire of the Senator was whether it would meet the situation he has in mind if we expressly repealed the law of 1890, leaving it so that if anyone wanted to go into one of these streams and take the chance of being interfered with in the future he would be permitted to do it without coming to the Secretary of War, or even to Congress, and asking for a permit?

Mr. CUMMINS. I will answer the Senator from Washington by saying that I have proposed two amendments to this bill. The first amendment limits the application of the bill generally to those rivers which in their ordinary, natural condition are used in a substantial way for the transportation of persons and property, and such streams as have been or shall be improved by the Government in order to make them so usable. That classifies certain kinds of streams to which the bill applies just as it is. My second amendment provides that with respect to all other streams which are within the jurisdiction of Congress under its constitutional power, dams may be built by anybody who secures the right to build them, from riparian owners or the State, and they may be used until the Government enters upon the improvement of those streams in order to make them navigable, and that then they must be removed or reconstructed without expense to the United States. My third amendment provides that any person who desires to secure the privileges of this act upon a stream of the latter kind may make an application to the Secretary of War, and thereupon the permit may be granted to him with the same effect as though the stream were of a navigable character.

This provides for every possible case, and in my judgment it would really encourage the development of streams for power, and would get rid of the fiction that they were being improved for navigation.

I feel that it is true that in my State, under an arrangement of that sort, we would produce ten times as much electric power as we would produce under the bill as it is, imposing upon us as it does the necessity of coming to the Secretary of War and of building such dams and structures and arrangements as the Secretary may believe necessary to facilitate navigation. I really want to encourage the community development. While I know it must be far from the intent of those who stand sponsor for it, the tendency of the bill is to encourage the development of power by great corporations and to discourage the development of power by small enterprises. It must necessarily be so.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, the Senator is mistaken in his construction of the bill. There is no discrimination between large and small enterprises. Everyone knows, of course, that a plant for generation of electricity can not be installed without the expenditure of a large sum of money.

Mr. CUMMINS. There is an actual discrimination in the bill.

Mr. SHIELDS. There is no intention to discriminate in any way, however.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Tennessee will admit that there is an actual discrimination in the bill, but I had not that in mind when I made the remark. I made the observation which I have just submitted for this reason. The great enterprises can adopt and execute the plans of the Secretary of War. The great enterprises can build dams that are fit and suitable for navigation. The small enterprises can not or they will not, because the matter involved will not be of sufficient magnitude to warrant them in building such dams as may be required for navigation.

Mr. SHIELDS. I do not admit there is any discrimination. The Senator will observe that the bill applies only to navigable waters upon which great enterprises can be placed. He must know that no development of any consequence has ever been made without costing immense sums of money. Take a case in my own State, the Hales Bar Dam, which was made by Mr. Brady with his own money, under a permit of Congress, in order that he might utilize the power there. By the provision of the act he was required to construct locks under the direction of the Secretary of War. The dam and locks cost him $9,000,000, and it made 35 miles of slack-water navigation and produced 58,000 horsepower.

The bill does not apply to small streams. There was no intention to give the Secretary of War jurisdiction over creeks and small rivers, or dams for gristmills or corncutters.

Mr. CUMMINS. That is just what the Senator has done in the bill. He did not intend it, I know.

Mr. SHIELDS. That is a difference of opinion.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator does not intend the bill to apply to the lesser enterprises that I have named, but nevertheless the bill does just that thing. I instance the Des Moines River. I am compelled always to go to my own State, because I am familiar with the waters there. The Des Moines River falls within the description of the first section of the bill. It is a navigable water in the eye of the law. We are just at this time preparing to build a dam in the river some 200 miles from its source for the purpose of supplying light, and incidentally power, to the city in which I live. It is for no other purpose. The power that can be generated will not be great enough to be transmitted throughout a wide territory, and the public-utility corporation to which the franchise has been granted must come to the Secretary of War, if the bill passes.

Mr. SHIELDS. If it is a navigable stream. Will the Senator allow me a moment to interrupt him? There is a stream of that kind in Tennessee now, the Little Tennessee River, running through the Great Smoky Mountains into North Carolina. A company is improving it at an expense of $4,000,000 by building a series of dams. I do not consider that river to be a navigable stream under the jurisdiction of Congress.

I wish to say again to the Senator that there is no difference between his views and those I entertain as to navigable rivers. As we have agreed outside of the Chamber our views are the same, and I have no doubt that the amendment the Senator will offer will be accepted.

Mr. CUMMINS. I know that. I very gratefully acknowledge the assistance the Senator from Tennessee has rendered me in preparing the amendment. But I want to impress the subject upon other Senators who are here. I do not want every man who desires to build a dam in the little rivers in my State which are theoretically navigable to be compelled to come to Washington and secure the approval of the Secretary of War and fulfill the hard and expensive conditions which he may impose for that sort of an improvement.

When it comes to a great enterprise that is intended to develop a vast amount of power intended to be transmitted over large territory, where immense capital is necessary, there is no one who yields more readily to the argument that it ought to be done through the intervention of the General Government than I. I am simply trying to preserve these smaller enterprises from the extinction which I think will follow without some such arrangement as I suggest and concerning which I have talked with the Senator from Tennessee. I will take it up at some other time.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I should like to ask the Senator from Iowa a question. He is perfectly familiar with the rivers in his State that he has been discussing. I should like to ask him if, in his judgment, there is a single solitary site on such a river that would induce capital to develop for the construction of power outside of a municipality? Does the Senator think there is?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Where would a private individual in this country go on a river and spend $1,000,000 or $2,000,000 to develop a power under the conditions that exist now? I very much fear that there is a very great misunderstanding about the development of power.

Mr. CUMMINS. Does the Senator from Alabama mean at any given point?

Mr. BANKHEAD. At any point on that river. You might go away at the head of it somewhere.

Mr. CUMMINS. I suppose, but connected by transmission lines.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I am not talking about transmission lines.

Mr. CUMMINS. There are at least three rivers in my State that could be improved so as to produce, I hesitate to say how much, power, but I should say 100,000 horsepower, but now, mark you, not at any given point.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I am talking about a number of dams connected by transmission lines.

Mr. CUMMINS. Connected by transmission lines.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, the experience of all the development in this country by those who have invested their money in the construction of dams for the purpose of producing and generating power is that whenever you go to construct three or four or five dams for the purpose of creating power in order to get an amount sufficient that would justify the operation, the expense is prohibitive. It costs just as much to build one dam as it does another if built the same height and where the conditions are the same. If you are going to build three or four or five dams on a river and undertake to connect them up with transmission, you make the cost prohibitive.

I wish to state my belief on this point, after very carefully investigating this whole question of power. I think I have been on all the navigable rivers in this country for the purpose of making these investigations, not on my own account, but I have gone with the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and I have gone with the commission that was appointed by the President. I do not believe there are over three power sites on navigable rivers in the United States where you can produce 100,000 horsepower. I should like to have some Senator suggest where there are any more.

Now, you can not construct a water-power plant without paying 10 per cent interest on the money. It always costs 10 per cent, because it is an uncertain proposition. No one can tell in advance whether it is going to be a paying proposition or not. It is not a banking proposition. You must go to some one who has the money and who is willing to take the chances on the investment, and you are never able to sell your bonds for more than 80 or 85 cents on the dollar. I never knew of any that were sold for more than that. You never get bonds for less than 5½ or 6 per cent interest, and when you put it together you are building a dam with money costing you 10 per cent. That being the case, men are not going to invest their money. They are going to be very careful.

As I said the other day, on one river in my State $1,200,000 have been expended for navigation purposes. Seventeen locks have been built and completed and there is not a single, solitary horsepower that can be developed in the river. Why? There are seasons of the year perhaps when there would be a surplus of water, more water than is needed for navigation; but in a large period of the year, in what is known as the dry season, there is scarcely enough water. That is the case in all the navigable rivers in this country. Taking the best of them, the largest of them, many of the plants, if you make them available, must be supplemented with an auxiliary steam plant and water power created at an immense cost. I do not care what the cost may be, if the power is not constant and continuous it is not valuable. If you are able to sell, ten, fifteen, or twenty thousand horsepower, primary power, what is known as minimum power, the water flow of the river produces that amount and you sell it, and that is all you can sell at that price that pays a profit. No one is going to build a factory, no one is going to build an electrical furnace, no one is going to build any sort of improvement to consume this power unless he has an assurance that he is going to get it every day in the year.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JAMES in the chair). Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Certainly.

Mr. WORKS. What the Senator has said has led me to believe that this bill will be of very little importance. Where does the Senator think on any of the navigable streams water power could be developed to any great extent?

Mr. BANKHEAD. On a great many streams to a small extent. The Senator was talking about the growth of great monopolies. There are a number of places where you can build a small plant and produce five or six or eight or ten or twelve thousand horsepower, but I am talking about great power. There seems to be a nightmare through the Senate. There is Hillsboro down in the Senator's State, which cost $9,000,000 in cash of private capital, and it produced only 58,000 horsepower at a cost of $9,000,000, built by private capital, and it improved the navigation of the Tennessee River 35 miles. The gentlemen who built that dam and that lock at that cost said to the Government of the United States: "We make you a present of this. We have improved your river for 35 miles. We do not charge you anything for it. We give it to you. We agree to furnish the electric current to operate your locks and supply the light for all the buildings around used in connection with the dam. We have agreed to maintain this dam. We have to do that in self-defense, because if we do not our power will be destroyed." So the Government was absolutely relieved from any cost whatever and the river was improved for 35 miles, extending above the great industrial city of Chattanooga.

Does anyone say that in addition to that you must pay the Government so much horsepower or so much killowat-hour for the use of the surplus water? That is the contention of a great many Senators here. I do not think that is fair. Let me give a concrete illustration. Down on the Coosa River in my State a private corporation built a dam under an act passed by Congress about 15 years ago, and there is no limit to the power. It is in perpetuity. They have it for all time. Now, what happened? They went to work and built that dam in the rapids of the Coosa River, in the shoals portion of it, where there was no navigation, and they have made practical navigation through that stretch of river for 35 miles.

Suppose that money cost only 6 per cent, and it cost 10 per cent to my knowledge. I have no interest in the world in it, but I have those figures from gentlemen who did have an interest. Suppose it cost 6 per cent. There is an annual contribution to the Government of the United States of $180,000. In addition to that do you think they ought to be required to pay so much per horsepower or so much per killowatt hour?

That contribution to the Government, I understand, goes on as long as the water flows. There is no limit to their charter under their permit. They have it in perpetuity. So they are contributing annually to the Government in order to provide navigation on that part of the river, $180,000 a year as long as the dam lasts. If the Government had done that work, of course, it would have been the Government's money but it would have been the same amount of money, and perhaps more than the private corporation expended. As I said, this company maintains the dam, keeps it in repair. It is necessarily compelled to do that in order to preserve its power. It furnishes all the electric current that the Government needs in providing for the buildings necessary to its operation.

Now, that is what we want to accomplish, if we can, in other navigable rivers in this country. We want to provide in this bill, if we can, that private capital shall do it. The Government will not do it. The Government will never enter upon the improvement of a large number of rivers in the country solely for the purpose of navigation.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I yield with pleasure.

Mr. WORKS. If that is the object of the Senator and it could be accomplished in this bill without going further, I should not have the slightest objection to its passage; I should favor it; but the trouble about the bill is one of the things I have suggested. You have undertaken to do more than that. You are undertaking to control the use of water after it has been developed, which I think is out of the question. It is not that I have any objection to accomplishing all that you really desire to accomplish; I would be glad to see it done; but the trouble about it is the bill goes very much further than that and pretends to control waters under the jurisdiction of the State. I want to have that distinctly understood.

Mr. BANKHEAD. In reply to what the Senator from California has said, I am delighted to know that he is in favor of the general proposition of the bill. I want to say to the Senator that the committee which had charge of the preparation of the bill had no intention whatever to accomplish any purpose except to improve the navigability of the rivers of the country and to develop power as an incident. Suppose there is a site where power can profitably be generated. It requires an immense amount of money to develop power to any extent as Senators will find if they examine the question. Suppose there is an available site upon any of the navigable rivers and a private corporation undertakes the work, for of course no individual would do it because they have to incorporate and get charter authority. So it must be a corporation. They go to work and get sufficient capital to develop that site on the plans and specifications that they must file with the Secretary of War to receive his approval, and a certificate or whatever else you call it that the navigability of the river will not be obstructed. That is the requirement. They go to work and develop this power. They give their work there, their money, and everything else to the National Government, and they expect to receive only whatever surplus power they may have after the navigation of the river is completely protected. How would you recompense those people who have spent their money, their time, and their energy and risked their credit for the great expense they have incurred, unless you give them the use of the surplus power and the surplus water that have been created?

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, I say to the Senator that I should not see any objection to that at all. I think the right to the use of the water should be granted under those circumstances, subject to regulation and control by the State. That that is not done is the thing I am objecting to.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Well, Mr. President, the Senator from California is no more of a State-rights man than am I.

Mr. WORKS. Well, I am beginning to think I am.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I have always believed in that. Now, let the Senator tell us—and it is information we want, and we can only get information by asking and answering questions—let the Senator now tell us how this thing can be accomplished under the direction and control of the States? I am now talking about navigable rivers.

Mr. WORKS. It can be done in half a dozen lines without the slightest difficulty.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Well, let me know what they are.

Mr. WORKS. I may offer some amendments later on that will help the Senator out in that respect, if he really desires it.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I really do desire information on that subject, because I have never been able, Mr. President, to reach the conclusion that you could improve navigable streams in this country, and, after improving them, put them under the jurisdiction and control of the State governments.

Mr. WORKS. I do not favor putting the rivers under the control of the State governments at all. Evidently the Senator does not understand my position. What I should do would be to allow the States to control the use of the water, the rates, and how the water should be applied after it was diverted—and, as the Senator says, it is not always diverted, which is true—but in whatever way it might be taken out, that the rates should be controlled by the States, and the subject of water power controlled in that way.

Mr. BANKHEAD. If this private corporation I am talking about goes to work and spends this vast sum of money, builds a dam, improves the navigability of the river, and incidentally creates power, would the Senator be willing that the State should then levy an additional tax on that power?

Mr. WORKS. Not at all.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Then I confess that I do not quite understand the position of the Senator.

Mr. WORKS. I think the Senator from Alabama should understand my position without very great difficulty.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I know the Senator is usually very clear, Mr. President, but really I have not been able to understand him.

Mr. WORKS. I am not insisting that the State should derive any profit from it at all, or that the State should be entitled to make any additional charge, or any sort of charge. I am talking about the rate that is to be paid by the consumers, that the State should have the right to regulate that.

Mr. BANKHEAD. You have a commission there to regulate that.

Mr. NELSON. That provision is left in the bill.

Mr. WORKS. I know, but it is left in the bill under conditions.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The commission in the Senator's State will certainly see that the consumers are not charged exorbitant prices. If they do not do so, they will have neglected a plain duty. They have been created by the State for that purpose.

Mr. WORKS. The trouble about it is that the Secretary of War is placed in a position where he can arbitrarily prevent this improvement by refusing to permit it upon the ground that it interferes with navigation or for the reason that the parties are not able to supply the power or to perform the other duties that they are expected to perform under their permit. That is giving a power to the Secretary of War that does not rest in him at all.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The Secretary of War grants a permit of that sort to private parties. That always requires a bond for the performance of their contract, just as if they let a contract to a private party to build an ordinary navigation dam.

Mr. WORKS. Certainly; or to require a bond to secure the erection of such a dam as will not interfere with navigation. The Secretary of War has a right to control the situation so far as navigation is concerned; that I concede; but he has no right to go any further than that.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I do not think he can under this bill.

Mr. WORKS. Well, there is where the Senator and I differ.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I know the Senator disagrees with me; but, as I have said, when a corporation goes to the Secretary of War for a permit to build a dam in a navigable river, the first thing they do is to furnish their plans and specifications and an estimate of the cost. Those are submitted to the Secretary of War. The corporation says, "Under these plans, and so forth, we want a permit to build this dam." The Secretary of War says, "All right; I think it is a good project; I think you will improve the navigability of the river, and it is likely that you will incidentally create power. I am willing to give you a permit; but your estimated cost is so much, and you must furnish me a good bond to insure that you will carry out your contract and build this dam and lock under the specifications that you file." When these conditions have been complied with the permit is granted by the Secretary of War. There will not be any trouble about that.

Well, Mr. President, so far as I am concerned, I never had such a thought as has been suggested in this debate, and I am satisfied that the Senators who have served on that committee for three years never had such a thought. First, the late Senator from Ohio, Mr. Burton, was a member of the committee. When his term expired the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] was substituted. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON], the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON], the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS], and myself were members of it. There were five of us. We went over this question most thoroughly, I think, during the last Congress and this, and I believe that I can confidently say that no member of that committee ever supposed for one moment that the provisions of this bill would have the effect that is being insisted upon by certain Senators upon the floor; they never had a thought, they never had a desire or purpose to accomplish anything by the provisions of this bill except what is plainly stated on its face—that is, to build dams for the improvement of navigation, and incidentally to create power. That is all they had in view.

I know it has been stated in the newspapers and in other places that under the provisions of this bill we have given great encouragement to and have created a vast water-power monopoly. If that is true, such provisions ought not to be in the bill. If it is true, some Senator ought to be able to point out the provisions of the bill which make a situation like that possible. Let them be taken out of the bill. No Senator would desire to retain anything of that sort.

We all know, however, Mr. President, that for 10 years we have had so-called legislation on the statute books on this subject; we all know that for that period of time not a single, solitary dam has been built in this country under its provisions. Why? Why has all this development been neglected? Why have all the benefits that would naturally accrue from the operation of such a law been denied the people of this country? I believe it has been because the provisions of that law have been so harsh and have been such that capital would not think for one moment of investing money in such projects. Therefore nothing has been done.

I am free to say, Mr. President, that if we can not pass a bill at this time that is workable, if we can not pass a bill at this time that is going to improve our navigable rivers or stretches of navigable rivers that are now nonnavigable, to be made navigable under the provisions of this bill—if we can not at the same time perfectly protect the rights of the consumers, the rights of the States, and also protect the Government in all of its rights, then I do not want any bill. I would greatly prefer to have no bill at all than to accept one that would not be workable, because then we would be in a worse position than we now are. We would probably have to wait 15 or 20 years while we were trying out the provisions of a bill that could not operate before we could get any other legislation on the subject.

Let us get down to business. If there is anything fundamentally wrong about this bill, if there is anything about it which does not operate fairly, if there is anything about it that fails to protect absolutely, so far as law can protect, the consumers of power, if there is anything about it that does not guard the rights of the States so far as we can guard them, at the same time recognizing the fact that the Government is supreme when the question of navigation is presented, let us amend the bill; but let us have some legislation on the subject. I am not wedded to this bill, but I simply do not want it amended all out of shape so that it will be inoperative and ineffective when it shall pass.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I do, of course.

Mr. WORKS. If the intention of this bill is what the Senator says it is—and I know it is, so far as he is concerned, or he would not say so—why can not there be a provision in the bill for the construction of these dams in such a way as to protect and promote navigation and the development of water power, and then follow it with a simple, plain provision that the power when developed shall be supplied under the rules and regulations and laws of the States?

Mr. BANKHEAD. That is in the bill.

Mr. WORKS. It is not in the bill, except in connection with conditions which are imposed in direct opposition to it.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Well, Mr. President, I am not a lawyer; but there were four or five good lawyers on the committee, and there is no question about the fact that they thought they were, as I have already stated, framing this bill along lines that were just and fair to the consumer and along lines that would take all possible care of and protect all the rights which the States possibly could have, and at the same time protect the rights and the interests of the Government.

The Senator from California will, of course, admit that so far as navigation is concerned, so far as the rules and regulations and statutes that refer to navigation of rivers are concerned, whenever they come into conflict with the State laws, the State laws must yield. The Government is supreme in that respect.

Mr. WORKS. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, this is all I care to say at this time, and I do not know that I shall have anything more to say during the discussion of this bill.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Michigan.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent——

Mr. BANKHEAD. I still have the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thought the Senator had yielded the floor.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I beg pardon. I thought the Senator had yielded.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I had not sat down.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thought the Senator from Alabama had concluded.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I yield.

ADJUDICATION OF PRIVATE CLAIMS.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I am directed by the Committee on War Claims to call up the bill (H. R. 6918) to relieve Congress from the adjudication of private claims against the Government.

The SPEAKER. The House automatically resolves itself into the Committee of the Whole House for the purpose of considering this bill, and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LLOYD] will take the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House in in Committee of the Whole for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 6918) to relieve Congress from the adjudication of the private claims against the Government, which the Clerk will report.

The bill was read.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this bill is made plain in its title—to relieve Congress from the adjudication of private claims against the Government. I think most of the Members of the House are familiar with the policy heretofore followed, but inasmuch as some of them may not be, I wish briefly to refer to it.

Heretofore whenever a bill has been introduced in the House relating to a claim growing out of the Civil War it has been considered by the Committee on War Claims, and when that committee has decided that the allegations are such that, if true, they would constitute a just and valid claim against the Government, the case has been referred to the Court of Claims for investigation. That same policy has been followed by the Senate.

The Court of Claims, following the instructions of Congress to investigate and report, has made findings to the House or to the Senate. When those findings have come to the House they have been investigated, and if the finding of the court is that the claimant was disloyal to the United States Government during the war, the claim has not been included in what has been known as the omnibus bill. But in those cases where the court found that the claimant was loyal and that his property was used and occupied or his stores and supplies taken, the amount found by the court to be the value of such use and occupation, or the value of such stores and supplies, has been included in the omnibus bill.

That bill has generally passed this House without very much opposition, but in the Senate it has been referred to a committee having jurisdiction not only over claims growing out of the Civil War but other classes of claims, and whenever the bill has passed the Senate, which has no Committee on War Claims, and has been returned to the House, it has generally included several classes of cases over which the conferees on the part of the House, coming from the War Claims Committee, have no jurisdiction and of which they have no knowledge. The result has been that year after year these bills have encountered obstacles, and generally in the closing hours of the session they have been defeated.

This policy has been unfair to the Court of Claims as well as unfair to claimants. It has made of the Court of Claims more of a commission than a court. The dockets of that court have been crowded with thousands of cases, and after a case has been investigated and dismissed by the House it has often been sent to the court again by the Senate, and the court has been unable to keep up with its business.

This policy is unfair to the claimant for the reason that one having a just and valid claim that has received a favorable finding at the hands of the Court of Claims has been unable to induce Congress thereafter to appropriate the money to pay the claim. An instance of that unfairness was contained in the last omnibus bill, in which bill claims were included for which favorable findings had been made during a period of 10 years, for no omnibus claims bill was passed by Congress from 1905 until 1915.

The pending bill, introduced by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], seeks to do away with this burdening of Congress with the consideration of private claims. It seeks to have Congress consider these claims but once, to have the committee pass upon the question as to whether or not the allegations of the bill are such as, if true, would constitute a valid claim against the Government, and in such case to refer the claim to the court, with power to try it as the case would be tried in any court of ordinary jurisdiction, and to render judgment in the case.

Mr. HAMLIN. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I will.

Mr. HAMLIN. Do I understand the gentleman to say that under this bill the Committee on War Claims would have the right to refer a case to the Court of Claims, or would they be obliged to report to the House and let the House refer it to the Court of Claims?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Under this bill, a bill introduced by the gentleman from Missouri would be considered by the War Claims Committee; and if reported by that Committee, the House would decide whether it should go to the Court of Claims, and it would go there under the provisions of this law with power in that court to try the case and render final judgment.

Mr. HAMLIN. Then, this House would have nothing at all to do with it?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. It would have nothing more to do with it after sending it to that court.

Mr. HAMLIN. But your War Claims Committee would have to report that bill to the House, and then the House could refuse to refer it to the Court of Claims, if it so desired.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Yes; the House could refuse to refer it, if it was not a case that the House thought should be sent there.

Mr. HAMLIN. And then if the House did refer it to the Court of Claims, the Court of Claims would adjudicate that case, and if they rendered a judgment in favor of the claimant, the Government would have to pay it without any further action on the part of Congress.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Except the ordinary course of referring the judgment to the Committee on Appropriations——

Mr. HAMLIN. I understand that; but if this bill should become a law, would it not be necessary for the claimant to present all of his evidence here in order to convince the House that he had a meritorious claim?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. That he had a prima facie case.

Mr. HAMLIN. That is what I am getting at. Does the gentleman understand that the House would act on the evidence that would simply make out a prima facie case, and would he have to prove his case?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. The gentleman knows the policy that has been pursued in the past in the consideration of these cases that are referred to the courts. Where the evidence offered made out a prima facie case, such as in the opinion of the committee deserved consideration by the Court of Claims, it has been sent to the court, and I have no doubt the committee will follow that policy in the future.

Mr. HAMLIN. I am in sympathy with the purposes of this bill as I understand it, but it occurred to me that if when this House refers this case to the Court of Claims it has no further opportunity to prevent the payment of the claim if the Court of Claims should find favorably for the claimant, then it becomes a judgment, and I think it ought to, and that is what I have contended for all the time. But if this becomes a law, will the House refer these claims to the Court of Claims on a showing or findings by the committee, knowing that they would be passed upon by the Court of Claims and become a judgment?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I think there will be no showing demanded except an ex parte showing because the Committee on War Claims never attempted to try the case when the proposition was to submit it to the Court of Claims.

Mr. HAMLIN. Every one knows that in the past the House would have another opportunity to pass on it and say whether they would pay it or not, but if this bill passes they would not have another opportunity, and it might require absolute proof by the claimant before they would send it to the Court of Claims.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. If the House did that, it would be in conflict with the purpose of the bill which constitutes the Court of Claims as the tribunal before which the claimant is to appear and prove his case.

Mr. HAMLIN. I hope the House will not make that requirement.

Mr. IGOE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Yes.

Mr. IGOE. Under this bill will the committee have the power to refer the bill to the Court of Claims without the House acting on the bill?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. No; the same policy will be pursued that has always been pursued; a resolution will be reported to the House referring the case to the Court of Claims.

Mr. IGOE. At the present time can the committee refer any case under the three methods to the Court of Claims without the House acting on it?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. No; the House must refer them.

Mr. FOSTER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Certainly.

Mr. FOSTER. In reporting the resolution as has been done in the past, referring these cases to the Court of Claims, there is not much of any report made, but simply a statement of what the case was. Would it be the policy of the committee in case this bill becomes a law, to make a more extensive report to the House involving these claims than it has done in the past?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Of course I am not authorized to speak as to the policy of the committee, but my own idea is that the committee would make more of an investigation than in the past. The purpose of the bill is this: It provides in one section that every person in this country who believes that he has a claim growing out of the Civil War shall have two years in which to have it adjudicated, and that the Court of Claims shall have no jurisdiction after that time, the purpose being to get rid of this class of cases and relieve Congress of the burden of considering them. I think we ought to make such an investigation as shall make out a prima facie case to justify its being sent to the Court of Claims.

Mr. FOSTER. Is it the gentleman's idea that the committee in reporting these cases from the committee in a resolution would file the evidence showing that they had made out a prima facie case?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I do not know about printing the evidence, but I think the report would make some statement as to the facts of the case so that the House would have some information about it.

Mr. MEEKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Yes.

Mr. MEEKER. If this becomes a law, would the claims be referred directly to the Court of Claims?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I do not quite understand.

Mr. MEEKER. A claim comes in and is referred to the committee, and, if this new court was established, would it be passed right on to the court?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. There is no new court established; the only thing the bill does is to provide that Congress shall give the Court of Claims power to try the case and render a final judgment instead of reporting back to the House its findings for Congress to again consider it. We limit to two years the time in which any claimant can file his claim.

Mr. MEEKER. And all of the claims would go to that court?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. They would go to the Committee on War Claims, and if the claimant presented a prima facie case it would be referred by the House, as it has been in the past, to the Court of Claims for consideration, and once referred there the claimant has a right to try his case and have a final adjudication.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Yes.

Mr. CAMPBELL. How many claims, roughly, are affected by this legislation?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. That is impossible for me to answer, but in the natural course of events the number of claims which can be presented at this time that have any merit in them and are capable of proof demanded by the Court of Claims must necessarily be small. For, as the gentleman from Kansas knows, the investigation by the Court of Claims of the United States is no mere formal matter; it requires proof and demands witnesses who are cross-examined by attorneys representing the department.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I understand all that; but the Committee on War Claims has in hand now the most of the claims that would finally reach the Court of Claims under this act, has it not?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I can not say. I believe that the number of claims would be comparatively small, but I can not estimate the number.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Has the Committee on War Claims made any estimate of the amount of liability covered by the legislation now under consideration?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I could not attempt to estimate it, because it would be an impossibility. As I stated in the report on this bill, and I refer the gentleman to it, if he will take the amounts paid during the last 25 or 30 years, when it was easier for a claimant to secure proof, basing it upon that, the amount for which the Government would be liable under this act must necessarily be small. That is the only basis that I have.

Mr. CAMPBELL. It is suggested that there are about 10,000 claimants who would finally reach the Court of Claims under this act.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I could not answer the gentleman in respect to that. I will refer the gentleman at this time to another section of the bill. The bill has a committee amendment which has been read, which restores to the docket of the Court of Claims those cases dismissed under the Crawford amendment adopted during the closing hours of the last session. It is true that the judges of the Court of Claims state that by the Crawford amendment several thousand cases were disposed of. The greater number of those cases were not for use and occupation, or claims for stores and supplies, but claims known as draft cases and pay claims. They constituted the greater number of cases that were dismissed.

Mr. KINKAID. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Yes.

Mr. KINKAID. Will the bill, if passed, repeal the right to submit Indian depredation claims to the Court of Claims?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. This bill would not affect the Indian depredation claims at all.

Mr. KINKAID. Only war claims?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Only war claims, and the bill specifically sets forth the class of cases affected by it.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Yes.

Mr. KINCHELOE. If this bill should become a law, all that would be necessary to get a claim to the Court of Claims would be to show a prima facie and just claim; in other words, to show the same as a petition that is good on demurrer, with ex parte evidence to show before this committee, and then it would be referred to the Court of Claims for final adjudication?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. The gentleman's understanding is correct.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Yes.

Mr. DICKINSON. Does this bill have any further effect than simply to reinstate these cases that have already been on the docket of the Court of Claims?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. It does this: It reinstates them and then gives to that court the power to try the case and render final judgment in the case without referring it back to Congress.

Mr. DICKINSON. Does it give jurisdiction to consider any claims other than those that have already been upon the docket?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. It does. It specifically says that the Court of Claims shall have no jurisdiction over claims referred to it after two years from the date of the passage of this act, so that at any time within two years from the passage of the act Congress would have the right to refer a claim to that court for consideration.

Mr. DICKINSON. Does the gentleman mean to say by that that where proof is ready to be presented and can be presented now, that has never been presented to the Court of Claims, bills can be introduced here with new proof and then referred to the Court of Claims during the next two years?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Two years after the passage of this act.

Mr. DICKINSON. Then the general purpose of the bill is to restore the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims, to open the matter up for two years, and then forever bar the presentation of any more claims?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. The gentleman has stated the purpose exactly.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Answering the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] a little while ago, the gentleman from South Carolina said something as to the number of claims that might arise under this bill?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I told the gentleman it was impossible for the committee to estimate, except in this way, that the report contains a statement of the amount paid for similar claims for a number of years past, and we can only base any estimate upon those figures, having in mind, however, that it was much easier to secure proof in the past than it will be in the future because of inability to secure witnesses.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I wanted to have this side of the House at least understand what the bill means. It pertains solely to war claims, does it not?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. It pertains solely to claims arising out of the use and occupation of property and stores and supplies.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Taken by the Union forces during the war from those who were still loyal to the Union?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Who were loyal to the Union.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The question of disloyalty does not arise under this bill?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Well, it does require proof of loyalty.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Proof of loyalty must be established?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Yes; under the provisions of this bill.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Now, the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] said there might be 10,000 claims arising as the result of the passage of this bill?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. No; the gentleman from Pennsylvania misunderstood him. What the gentleman from Kansas said was that he understood nearly 10,000 cases had been dismissed. The fact is, on the docket of the Court of Claims there were several thousand cases, and, as I have explained, they did not grow out of use and occupation or for stores and supplies, but included cases for back pay of officers and draft cases, and each claim making a separate case, amounted up to the thousands. I think there are about 3,000 draft cases.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman remembers when we passed the last war-claims omnibus bill.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I remember it distinctly.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. How much money was carried in that bill?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. The bill, which was the largest of those bills, carried $1,866,555; and I should say this to the gentleman, that that covered findings over a period of 10 years, from 1905 to 1915, for the reason that Congress had not in 10 years passed an omnibus bill, and these claims had gradually accumulated.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. To whom was this money paid—this $1,800,000?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. It was paid to the claimants whom Congress named in the bill.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I want to find out so the House can understand. Those claimants were the actual losers of the property, the actual owners?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. In every case they were either the actual owners or the heirs of the actual owners.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman understands that 50 years have elapsed since this damage was done, and presumably most of those who were directly damaged have died. Now who are the beneficiaries?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. The beneficiaries are the heirs of those who were directly injured. I do not know that I can assent to the statement that the majority of them have died because I have not the information.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman from South Carolina tell us to what extent the right to a claim may pass on down to the next generation?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. This bill does not pass upon it and I am not in a position to state. I know this, that if this bill passes that after two years the court will have no jurisdiction and the question will not arise as to how far this distribution shall go, for under this bill claims not presented, not sent to the court, in two years will not have to be heard.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Then they are barred forever?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. They are barred forever.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. They are not prevented from coming to Congress?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Of course this Congress can not attempt to bind the actions of a future Congress, we realize that. We have no power to say what a future Congress shall do, and all we do say is that the Court of Claims will have no jurisdiction in cases submitted to them after two years; and the only way in which the Court of Claims could consider them would be by an act of Congress restoring to that court jurisdiction.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Can the gentleman say about what volume of money would be necessary to pay existing claims, those now pending in the Court of Claims and in Congress?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I could not, for this reason: A great majority of the cases pending in the Court of Claims have no merit under the rulings and proof required by that court, and I dare say there are not 5 per cent of those now on file that would ever receive the favorable judgment of that court.

Mr. REAVIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I do.

Mr. REAVIS. The gentleman speaks of cases being on file in the Court of Claims. They are not on file, are they; were they not dismissed by the Crawford amendment?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I could not hear the gentleman.

Mr. REAVIS. This bill is for the purpose of reviving those claims which were dismissed, is it not? I say, these claims are not on file in the Court of Claims, but they were dismissed by that court under the authority of the Crawford amendment?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Yes; that is right.

Mr. REAVIS. This bill is designed to revive the claims which were dismissed——

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. It is.

Mr. REAVIS. And to centralize the responsibility of the Court of Claims by giving them jurisdiction either to enter judgment in favor of the claimant or to dismiss the claim?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. That is the purpose of the bill.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Were they dismissed after a hearing by the court or by Congress?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I will answer the gentleman in this way: When the omnibus bill was pending in the Senate on the 3d of last March an amendment was offered by Senator Crawford, known as the Crawford amendment, and was accepted by the Senate. It came over here, and it reached here during the late hours of March 3 or the early hours of March 4. As a member of the committee with the chairman, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GREGG], I remember very distinctly reading the Crawford amendment at that time. There was no opportunity to submit it to the committee. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. GREGG] and myself were of the opinion, as a result from our casual reading of the amendment, that it referred only to cases which might be considered by Congress hereafter, and meant to provide that no case should be sent to the court hereafter. My idea has always been to fix some time when we should dispose of these cases, and so we readily agreed to it. It was brought up in the House; there was no debate on it—I should say this in justice to the House, that the House did not know the effect of the amendment—it was agreed to and went back to the Senate, where it was agreed to without any further debate and became the law.

The Court of Claims thereafter, on motion of one of the representatives of the Department of Justice, dismissed the pending cases on the ground that the Crawford amendment took from the court jurisdiction to further investigate those cases, and by that decision dismissed the several thousand cases from the docket.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. You propose to remedy that situation by this bill?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. If the gentleman will allow me to go on, I will say that many of the claimants had presented their proof, argued their cases, and many of them had secured a favorable finding which had not been printed. They came to their Representatives in Congress to induce them to introduce bills restoring jurisdiction to that court, and there are before the committee a large number of such bills and a still larger number of private bills to restore claims which were at that time pending in the court.

The committee in recommending the passage of the bill introduced by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], which provides the right to a claimant to go to the court within two years, thought it only fair that those people who had been given the right by Congress heretofore to go into that court, and had presented their proof and had been deprived of their right to secure a finding by reason of the Crawford amendment, should be placed on the same footing with those who under the terms of the bill of the gentleman from Illinois had the right to their day in court, and for that reason we offer the amendment restoring those claims to the docket and giving the court jurisdiction to dispose of them; to find against those who do not comply with the law and to find for those who have a just and valid claim against the Government under the law.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Section 6 of the bill provides that if a claim is presented by an association or corporation, or if the amount is above $500, evidently the claim can be presented by and paid to anyone, but if it is presented by an individual, and the amount is less than $500, it can be paid only to the widow or children, generally speaking. Is that true?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Under that section, as I read it, it is provided that the claimant, the actual owner of the property, could recover in case he is alive, and if he is not and the amount is less than $500, that his widow and children may recover without having an executor or administrator appointed.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. That is true so far, but under this section would not an association or corporation, or even an individual, having a claim of over $500 be permitted to present the claim, and anyone, no matter how remotely interested he might be, present the claim and have it allowed before the court?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I do not so understand it.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. I have not seen the bill before, and of course have not had time to examine this section 6; but, as the gentleman from South Carolina has it, it would seem to me that it would offer opportunity for claims by associations or corporations——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Or assignees.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Or assignees, now in possession of or owned by claim agents or attorneys, who scour the country and find these claims. Now, if the statute of limitations is to run against anyone it looks as though it ought to run against these associations or corporations organized under the law and able to look after their own interests. If they have not presented their claims within 50 years they certainly ought to be barred.

There is another thing. As I read it a claim under $500 can be presented by and paid only to the widow or the children of the original claimant or sufferer, but if the claim is more than $500 a claim can be presented by anyone.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. The gentleman will understand that the purpose of that provision in this bill, according to my understanding of it, is—the author can doubtless explain it better than I can, but my understanding is it refers to claims less than $500 and where there is no administrator—that the claimant should not be denied the right to receive that money where the claimant was the widow or children of the deceased owner. That is all there is to it. As a matter of fact, there is not one claim of a corporation in all these claims, as the gentleman would find if he would investigate them. Because you know that in the days of the Civil War we had not the corporate existence that we now have throughout the country.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Evidently there was an attempt here on the part of the committee to provide some protection for the widow or heirs of the owner who originally lost the property.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Yes.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. But certainly section 6 as it stands does not offer any protection of that kind. The claim could be presented by anyone. Attorneys or claim agents, perhaps, could get them by assignment from those who did not know they had any claim or any right to make any presentation to the court.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Will the gentleman yield for just a moment?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I yield to the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I have read this section 6, and it seems to me it confines it entirely to the widow or the children. Wherein does the gentleman get the idea that the assignee of the claimant, for instance, could present it and collect it?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. There is nothing in the bill that says an assignee can not present a claim and collect it, and the gentleman knows very well that a very large number, a large percentage of claims, presented to the committees of this House having jurisdiction of them, are in the hands of assignees and claim agents, and they are worked up.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. If the gentleman from Michigan will allow me——

Mr. CLARK of Florida. If the gentleman will permit me just a moment——

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I will.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I want to say to the gentleman that the section he refers to expressly stipulates they can only be collected by the widow or the heirs.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. If less than $500. If more than $500, it can be collected by anyone.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. No. If the gentleman from Michigan will allow me, that inference is not justified by the language. The purpose is to require payment to the executor or administrator, and when no demand is presented by a duly appointed executor or administrator, the court would not be presumed to pay to anybody having no right.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Certainly. If the amount is over $500—and I am not sure that it is any amount—if it is over $500, an assignee, or attorney, or agent, any kind of a man assuming to represent an original claimant, can put in a claim and, if allowed, collect it.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. The only purpose of the section is to cover cases where executors and administrators have not been appointed; in the case of a small claim to let the widow and children recover, but if the claim is above $500 it does not affect existing law at all.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Take the case of a claim of over $500. Anyone can present it and collect the judgment. Is not that true under this section?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. In the case of a claim under $500, where there is no executor or administrator, the widow or children could recover.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. There is something here that squints in the direction of protection for the widow or children, but there is nothing here that says an agent can not get possession of the claim of the widow or children, even if the claim is below $500. The claim is in favor of the widow and children, but an assignee can urge the claim and collect the judgment.

There may be some reason or excuse for permitting, even at this late date, claims in favor of the widow and children of the original sufferer, but there certainly ought to be some provision in this bill and something put into the law that will bar associations or corporations, those who were certainly able to take care of their own interests and not let more than 50 years elapse without presentation of any claim at all.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. May I read the general law to the gentleman?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Yes.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I read:

That all transfers and assignments hereafter made of any claim upon the United States, or any part or share thereof, or interest therein, whether absolute or conditional, and whatever may be the consideration therefor, and all powers of attorney, orders, or other authorities for receiving payment of any such claim, or any part or share thereof, shall be absolutely null and void, unless the same shall be freely made and executed in the presence of at least two attesting witnesses, after the allowance of such claim, the ascertainment of the amount due, and the issuing of a warrant for the payment thereof.

This was just handed to me by a member of the committee.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. What law is that?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. That is the general law.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. What name do you give to it? In what law is that found? You refer here in the bill to several of these acts by name.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. That is not referred to in the report at all. It is the general law. You will find it in Tenth Statutes at Large, page 170.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. The gentleman does not insist that that is a protection to anyone? Legal papers are always executed in the manner stated.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I think that is so, and ought to be; but let me answer. This bill does not propose to change existing law in any way except to do this, that where there is a small claim under $500, where a widow has no executor or administrator appointed on the estate of her deceased husband, the courts will have the power to order the payment of the money to the widow or children. No assignment can be made until after the court has made a finding under the general law.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Oh, but anyone who may have that assignment from them can collect.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. No. In all other respects the existing law will continue. All that the committee intended to do was to authorize the widow to receive payment where the amount was so small as not to justify the expense of having an executor or an administrator appointed.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. It seems to me that this bill offers encouragement to the agents and attorneys in bringing up these claims and would assist them, and, so far as assisting widows and children is concerned, it would be an embarrassment to them.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. It provides that it shall be of assistance to the widow and children. It does not mention assignees or claim agents.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. It ought to mention them and disbar them from the privileges of the act.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. You assume that they have the power and that this bill should exclude them. I understand that that is the gentleman's position. The bill does not mention them.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. In just one moment. Will the gentleman from Michigan give me his attention for a moment?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I want to call the gentleman's attention to the general provision of the law, which is not affected at all by this bill. The law provides that there can be a transfer under certain conditions. I want to call the gentleman's particular attention to the conditions: It shall be "executed in the presence of at least two attesting witnesses after the allowance of such claim."

Now, then, surely there is not anybody who is going to transfer a claim for practically nothing after its allowance. I read again:

Its ascertainment and declaration, and a warrant issued.

The statute goes on to say:

After the allowance of such a claim, the ascertainment of the amount due, and the issuance of a warrant for the payment thereof.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Will the gentleman tell the House whether, in the claims presented before the committee of this House, they are presented always in the names of and by the original claimants, and that the hand of an assignee is not seen until the claim is finally allowed and the payment is all ready?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I say to the gentleman that that is the law as it stands to-day, and this bill does not seek to change it and does not change it.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I will.

Mr. SLOAN. It seems to me this House is interested in knowing how large a contract it is taking on its hands. Has not the Committee on War Claims made any effort to classify the claims that would be involved in this? For instance, is the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] prepared to say what is the number of claims that were cut out by the Crawford amendment, and what the amounts were?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I can say to the gentleman that that is impossible, for the reason which I attempted to explain. The Crawford amendment cut out not only the claims referred to in this bill for stores and supplies and for use and occupation, but back-pay claims of all kinds. The gentleman can get as accurate an idea as is possible for any Member of this House to secure as to the amount affected by this bill by reading the report and ascertaining the amounts already paid for claims of a similar nature. During the period of 10 years from 1905 to 1915 the findings of the court amounted to about $1,500,000. The gentleman and I will agree that in the past it has been much easier for claimants to secure the proof upon which to present their cases than it will be during the next two years; and, in addition, in the very nature of things, the great majority of these claims have been paid; but that amount is the only basis which anyone could use for the purpose of estimating what the future would bring.

Mr. SLOAN. But it occurred to me that if the Crawford amendment cut out a large number of claims that were involved in the bill of last session the committee could very easily give a tabulation of those claims, the names and the amounts, and also an estimate of other claims. We are very much interested in knowing whether this involves a possible expenditure of $1,000,000 or of $100,000,000; and it seems to me that this committee, the servant of the House, in asking a large appropriation, ought to give the House some idea of how large it would be.

Now, I want to ask just one other question right here.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Go ahead.

Mr. SLOAN. When these claims were referred to the Court of Claims by the committee, assuming that the committee made some sort of an investigation to discover whether there was any merit, and the degree of merit, a classification of those claims based upon their apparent merit and a compilation of the figures along that line would be very important to a great many people, considering the state of the Treasury, to show whether we are proceeding to do something that will involve $1,000,000, which would not be much, or $100,000,000, which might be a great deal. I heard a very eloquent argument from that side of the Chamber the other day, based upon a large pension bill, which argument had its basis, in part at least, upon abandoned property, or property taken by the Government from loyal citizens. From the figures suggested there and the figures suggested here, and other matters that readily occur to one who thinks on the subject, it appears that we are undertaking a pretty large contract if we open up this bill to the extent now proposed.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Let me answer the gentleman. In the investigation by the committee there has not been a trial of the facts in the case, for the reason that the bill was referred to the Court of Claims for that purpose; and one of the evils of that system which this bill would correct would be to do away with that division of responsibility which left Congress relying upon the Court of Claims to investigate and left the Court of Claims relying upon Congress finally to pass upon the case. This bill seeks to concentrate the responsibility upon the Court of Claims, and when that responsibility is concentrated these claims will receive more careful consideration than heretofore.

The gentleman wants to know if the committee could not ascertain, from the bills pending in the Court of Claims which were dismissed by the Crawford amendment, the probable total of these claims. In reply to the gentleman I will say that on the docket of the Court of Claims there were a large number of these claims, but I do not believe that 5 per cent of them were cases in which judgments would be recovered by the claimant, and it would be entirely unfair to add up the totals of all cases referred to the Court of Claims; because, even though this committee and the House exercise caution in sending these cases, others have been sent to the court in the past by the Senate. This bill concentrates the responsibility; and if the gentleman fears that it will cause the payment of a large amount I will ask him this: The bill requires that the person who claims that the Government owes him money shall prove his loyalty to the Government, that his property was taken from him, and that it is a just debt. Does not the gentleman believe, if it is a just debt, if the claimant's property was taken, and if he was loyal to the Government, that upon the establishment of those facts the Government ought to pay the judgment?

Mr. SLOAN. I am in favor of the Government's paying all its honest debts; but in the matter of appropriating a large amount of money some of us are more interested in knowing what the maximum of a claim is, which might be figured out from these claims themselves, rather than the minimum as estimated by the gentleman, which he says is 5 per cent. We want to know what the hundred per cent is?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Even at 100 per cent I will say, as a Member of this House, that if the Court of Claims finds, after trying the case, that the man was loyal to the Government, that the Government took his property from him, and that it is a just debt, and it renders judgment in his favor, in my opinion such a judgment ought to be paid, and I would vote to pay it. And I will ask the gentleman, Does he not think it ought to be paid?

Mr. STAFFORD. Not if the claims were in the hands of claim agents.

Mr. SLOAN. The claimants having allowed their claims to run for 50 years, if they are now in the hands of heirs or proper parties, perhaps there would be no objection; but if they have become a matter of speculation, so that the original people who were damaged will never profit a penny, it would make a great deal of difference.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I agree with the gentleman about that.

Mr. SLOAN. I do not propose, as far as I am concerned, to commit myself to a proposition of this kind until I know what its probable maximum may be, and so far the gentlemen in charge of the bill have refrained or neglected to give any suggestion or estimate of how large a drain this might possibly be upon the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. The gentleman and I are in accord in that we do not want anybody to recover who is not entitled to do so, but we believe we have thrown about the bill all the safeguards that we can. I am sorry that it is impossible to estimate the amount that might possibly be recovered under it.

Mr. IGOE. The gentleman said in answer to a question some time ago that the committee did not have authority to refer claims to the Court of Claims without the consent of Congress. Now, if there are any claims at all that might come to the committee under the Bowman Act, why should they not refer them under section 1 of that act?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. That was repealed.

Mr. IGOE. But it is referred to in this act.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Only as a reference to cases that have been sent to the court under that act that may be there.

Mr. IGOE. Are there any cases that might come under this act?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Not under this act. They have to come to the House.

Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SLOAN] is recognized in opposition to the bill.

Mr. REAVIS. Mr. Chairman, I want recognition as ranking member of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair may not be advised about the situation, but the Chair understands that under the new rule there shall be two hours of general debate. One hour has been used in favor of the bill, now if there is anyone opposed to the bill he should be recognized. Is there anyone that wishes to be recognized in opposition to the bill?

Mr. SIMS. I wish to be recognized in opposition to the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Is the gentleman opposed to the bill?

Mr. SIMS. I am opposed to it without amendment.

Mr. MANN. That is hardly fair.

Mr. SIMS. I do not wish to do anything that is not fair. I am willing that the gentleman from Nebraska should have the time on that side, but I do not want to be cut out.

Mr. REAVIS. I do not wish to cut the gentleman out.

Mr. SIMS. I know the gentleman does not, but that was the only way I could get in.

Mr. REAVIS. Mr. Chairman, am I recognized?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska is recognized.

Mr. REAVIS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, this bill is designed to expedite the payment of claims which ought to be paid, and to prevent the payment of claims which ought not to be paid. The present system is not very satisfactory. Under the existing system we refer to the Court of Claims, by resolution of either House of Congress, claims for their finding of facts, and they report the finding of facts back to Congress. When the finding of facts is reported back fixing a certain amount, regardless of what the claim was, that practically is the judgment of the Court of Claims and ought to be paid. There are many of these findings that ought never to be paid, because they are not for property for which the Government ought to pay; and the fact that there are many of the claims which ought not to be paid and that it is very difficult to segregate the claims through the committee of the House which ought to be paid, prevents, in the main, the payment of any of the claims except by long delay. When any of the claims are paid, some of those which ought not to be paid at all creep in along with those which ought to be paid.

In the last Congress we passed an omnibus war-claims bill through the House without any consideration, it being impossible to give time to the consideration of an omnibus claims bill. That bill went to the Senate, and a good many of the items which the House put in were stricken out and a good many items which had been left out in the House bill were inserted in the Senate. In the end certain claims were allowed, as I discovered after the bill passed the House, and a good many claims included in the bill before it passed the House which the committee itself did not desire to have paid and were not in favor of paying that class of claims.

But it is impossible for a committee of the House to consider in a few days of time thousands of these claims and not make many mistakes, no matter how careful they may try to be. In addition to that we passed what is called the Crawford amendment, which I think was generally supposed by the few Members who knew there was such a proposition would only apply to claims in the future, but which in fact directed the dismissal of all of the war claims then pending in the Court of Claims.

We had just referred to the Court of Claims by several resolutions in the last House a large number of new cases. In the Congress preceding we had referred to the Court of Claims by resolution of the House uncontested a very large number of cases. Many of these cases had proceeded to a point of taking evidence, some almost to the point of having a finding of the court. Some had proceeded to the point of having a finding by the court. Where they had not proceeded to a finding of the court under the Crawford amendment the court was required to and did dismiss the cases. They made a report to Congress of the cases which were dismissed. I have been over the report casually, and a very large number of cases are cited. Of course, it was unfair for Congress to pass a resolution inviting a claimant to present his evidence to the Court of Claims, to hire an attorney, to take testimony at his expense, and then when he had been to that expense and trouble order a dismissal of the case without giving him any further show in the court. To that extent there would be undoubtedly a general consensus of opinion that the claimant ought to be reinstated in the court.

I introduced the bill that is now pending, but it does not cover that subject. It is covered, however, by amendments to the bill. I think we have reached the time when the purpose of Congress is quite well settled about these claims, and it has become the settled purpose of Congress—eventually, at least—to pay claims to those who were loyal citizens of the Government whose property was taken for the use of the Army of the United States, or whose property was used in the way of buildings for the Army of the United States. That has become the settled purpose of Congress.

Originally there were a great many divisions of opinion as to the character of cases in which property should be paid for by the General Government growing out of these war claims, but it has become practically the settled purpose of the Government—at present, at least—that we will not pay claims for the deliberate destruction of property. We have paid some of those claims unintentionally, and as time goes on, unless we wind it up, we will not only pay more of the claims, but we will invite everybody whose property was destroyed to make claims against the Government.

The distinguished gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS], who was long the able, careful, and diligent chairman of the Committee on War Claims, endeavored to prevent not only claims of that character, but even their reference to the Court of Claims for findings. Now, having determined practically the character of the cases which we will pay, the bill now before us is to authorize the Court of Claims to enter judgment in that character of cases, and will eliminate practically all other kinds of cases. And after two years it would eliminate any other cases at all which have not been brought to the attention of Congress before the expiration of the two years from the passage of the act.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT. I want to ask the gentleman if, in view of the fact that it is hoped that this law will look to a finality of these claims, he thinks that two years is a sufficient time?

Mr. MANN. I think it is.

Mr. GARRETT. Does not the gentleman think that at the conclusion of two years the Congress will again have this question up for a further extension of the matter?

Mr. MANN. I doubt it. Most of the claims have already been presented to Congress.

Mr. GARRETT. If the gentleman will permit me, I concur heartily in the idea that there should be an end to the consideration of these claims. All that I am anxious about is that we shall provide a sufficient time, so that it may be a real finality and not a mere temporary matter.

Mr. MANN. As a matter of fact, those who 50 years after the war have not discovered that they have a claim at all might properly be barred; but this will give them two years' time in which to bring the claims to the attention of their Member of Congress, who will then introduce a bill, and, under a resolution of the House or Senate, that bill will be referred to the Court of Claims, which will have, of course, longer time in which to make a finding and in which to enter judgment. Having determined the law under which we will proceed for the payment of these claims, we ought to pay the claims that we intend to pay and we ought to say that we do not intend to pay the other classes of claims. Of course we can not bind what a future Congress will do, but if we pass a bill like this I do not think that a future Congress is likely to open up a class of claims which is not covered under the provisions of this bill. There may be claims presented which ought to be paid from time to time, and doubtless will, and they doubtless will receive consideration from the Committee on War Claims, which would still have the power to report the claim; but the purpose and the theory of the legislation are to give these people an opportunity in a court of claims under restricted terms as to the court's jurisdiction and permit the court not merely to make a finding of fact but to confer upon the court the responsibility of entering a judgment and make the court a little more cautious about what it does, then pay the judgment and stop the other claims.

I would be very glad now to yield to anyone who desires to interrogate me.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have the gentleman clear up the question, so far as the right of an assignee of a claimant under this bill to be entitled to the same right as he is at present is concerned.

Mr. MANN. I take it that an assignee of a judgment would have the same right to one of these judgments that he would have as to any other judgment entered against the United States.

Mr. STAFFORD. My query is directed to an assignee of a claimant of the same character as is embodied in this bill—over $500?

Mr. MANN. The $500 part of it has nothing to do with it.

Mr. STAFFORD. I understand that it has not.

Mr. MANN. Section 4 of the original bill authorized the payment of judgments to widows and children where the claim was not over $500, without putting them to the expense of having an executor or administrator of an estate appointed. That is all that section does. It is a proper provision that I think no one will object to.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question. If this bill becomes a law, will the heirs of the deceased claimant be entitled to prosecute these claims, however far removed?

Mr. MANN. That would depend upon the action of Congress. No claimant can go into the Court of Claims under this bill or any other bill unless the matter is referred to the Court of Claims by this House or the Senate. In order to have a claim referred to the Court of Claims, a bill is introduced in the House or in the Senate, defining what should be paid and to whom it should be paid. Then, if the House or the Senate desires, by resolution that bill is referred to the Court of Claims, and, under existing law, the Court of Claims makes a finding on the claim in the bill and returns that finding to the House of Congress which referred it to the court. Under this proposed law, within the character of cases described in the bill, the court would go further and enter a judgment, but the court would be given no original jurisdiction to take possession of a claim, and no claimant can get to the court without proceeding through the existing channels, which are either House of Congress, and the introduction of a bill.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Mr. Chairman, following that a little further, if the gentleman will permit, the point I am trying to ascertain is what tribunal would determine who should prosecute this claim—that is, the beneficiaries of the deceased claimant—and how remote could they be? Would the Congress, by resolution, say that, or would the committee or the court?

Mr. MANN. I thought I had made myself plain, but evidently I have not. A bill is introduced to provide payment to John Jones, or the estate of John Jones or the heirs of John Jones or some one else, for certain property claimed to have been taken by the Government of the United States. That bill is referred to the Court of Claims with the authority under the law for the Court of Claims to make an investigation and a finding. Then the claimants in that bill, having the bill before the court, make their claim before the court. I have no doubt that if we name some particular person in the bill, and that person dies, his estate may proceed with the claim as with any other claim.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I want to inquire to see if I understand rightly; the filing of a claim stops the running of the statute of limitation; that is the claim must not be determined within the two years——

Mr. MANN. No; the two years is a mere matter of time of reference to the Court of Claims.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I would like to inquire further. Something was said about this being a bill to define the character of claims. Is that determined by the property that was destroyed, or the justice of the claim that is presented?

Mr. MANN. The bill refers to certain claims in behalf of religious and eleemosynary institutions and fraternal organizations. A few years ago the court held that the question of loyalty could not be raised against a corporation, and that if the Government had used a lodge room of one of the fraternal orders or a church room of a church organization the Government was under obligation to pay for use and occupation. Thousands of those cases have been referred to the Court of Claims, and we have paid a great many of them. This bill would authorize the entry of judgment in cases of that character where the court heretofore has made findings in favor of the claimants. It would authorize the entry of judgment as to individuals where property was taken as supplies for the use of the Army, where cattle were taken, where grain was taken, where flour was taken for the actual use of the Army from loyal citizens. It would provide also for the payment of claims where real estate of loyal citizens was used for the use of the Army and anything of that kind.

In all of those classes of claims we now pay them practically without question, if they can be brought to the floor of the House. We do not pay claims which amount to other use of property in reference to the destruction or the damage of property, because the Union Army destroyed a great deal of property in the South, much of which belonged to citizens who can make proof that they were loyal to the Federal Government, but we never have undertaken to pay those intentionally, those cases being necessarily concomitant with war conditions.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. That is the question I had in mind also.

Mr. BENNET. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. I will.

Mr. BENNET. The gentleman has read the Bowman and Tucker Acts. Does the gentleman agree with me that if this bill becomes a law it will do away with the reference of these claims under the Bowman Act?

Mr. MANN. The Bowman Act has been repealed.

Mr. BENNET. It is printed here in the report as part of the existing statute.

Mr. MANN. The Bowman Act and the Tucker Act have both been repealed.

Mr. BENNET. I understand by a provision of the judicial code.

Mr. MANN. By section 151 of the judicial title, which takes the place of the Bowman and Tucker Acts and which does not authorize a committee of the House to make reference to the Court of Claims.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time may be extended——

The CHAIRMAN. The time is in the control of the gentleman from South Carolina and the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. REAVIS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes further to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. McKELLAR. Regardless of whether they have been dismissed heretofore, cases which have been referred to the Court of Claims are referred to that court again under this bill?

Mr. MANN. All claims where the court has heretofore made findings.

Mr. McKELLAR. Where no findings have been made, but where they have simply been referred?

Mr. MANN. All claims where the court has heretofore made findings and reported back to Congress, the court can now enter judgment on those findings, provided it comes within the class enumerated in the bill; or, if the court has not made findings, when it proceeds to the point of making a finding hereafter it will enter a judgment in those classes of claims. As I understand, it is the purpose to offer an amendment to the bill to dismiss war claims referred to the Court of Claims which do not authorize the court to enter a judgment under the description of the bill.

Mr. SLOAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. I will.

Mr. SLOAN. I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois if the legislation involved in this bill, together with what is already on the statute books, will exclude all classes of claims being allowed, save and except those being enumerated in the bill before us now?

Mr. MANN. Well, within the two years' time of filing of new claims. Of course, the committee can refer any kind of bills to the Court of Claims, and if the court could not enter judgment under the provisions of this act as to these other bills or claims referred within the two years the court would be required to make a finding and send it back to Congress. Of course, after the two years, if that remains the statute, no claims can be referred to the Court of Claims, and meanwhile the Court of Claims can not enter judgment on those claims. I think the probable effect of the bill will be to eliminate all of those claims except the classes of claims which we would pay now without question.

Mr. SLOAN. Just one further question. Is it a matter of statute or merely a matter of practice observed by this House for a series of years that these claims, based upon destruction of property incident to war or battle, are not included? Is that a matter of practice or a matter of statute?

Mr. MANN. I think it is a matter of practice on the part of the "gentleman from Illinois" [Mr. MANN] to go over all of these bills proposed to be referred to the Court of Claims, and if any of them provide for claims for destruction of property in recent years, to insist that that claim be taken out of the resolution or else to oppose the resolution, and with that opposition it is very difficult to pass such resolution, with so many items in it, and the committee itself has endeavored to keep those out, but many of them have in fact crept in under the guise of taking property for use and occupation when it was in fact destruction, because, when a claim is referred to the Court of Claims, the court has to make an examination and a finding of facts. We have not always been very careful to discriminate between the findings of fact where the claim ought to be paid and where the claim ought not to be paid, and we have included in the past items in the omnibus claims bill, where the court, so far as it could, has indicated its express desire that claims shall not be paid until the issue is followed out and there was a finding of the Court of Claims. Accidents happen.

Mr. SLOAN. Might it not be advisable, then, that this bill be amended, so that these claims heretofore kept out by the vigilance of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] would be kept out by statute?

Mr. MANN. I think it is perfectly legitimate to let them file their claims for two years' time. Of course, a bill of this kind is necessarily more or less of a compromise.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the gentleman this question in order to get his judgment. I would like to ask if, under this bill that he has introduced and which has been amended, with regard to the cases that have been dismissed, heretofore referred to the court either by the action of the Senate or of the House under what was called the Tucker Act, the Court of Claims will have power to render a judgment against the Government in any case unless affirmative proof of loyalty is offered which is satisfactory to the court in the particular case?

Mr. MANN. I think affirmative proof of loyalty has to appear.

Mr. SIMS. Absolutely. Now, is it not a fact that in reporting on claims by the Court of Claims under what is called the Tucker Act the court reports the facts without reference to the question of loyalty?

Mr. MANN. I think not. Under the Bowman Act——

Mr. SIMS. I am not talking about the Bowman Act.

Mr. MANN. But I am. Under the Bowman Act the court must find the claimant was loyal before the claim can be presented at all. Under the Tucker Act the court proceeds with the case to a final finding, but makes the finding in the end as to loyalty.

Mr. SIMS. Now, does not the gentleman believe——

Mr. MANN. In other words, they do not have to make two bites of a cherry under the Tucker Act, while they do under the Bowman Act.

Mr. SIMS. Does not the gentleman believe that many payments have been made where they would not have been made if left to the court?

Mr. MANN. I think the members of the court will have to admit that they have not been as careful in making the findings as they have been in rendering judgment, but we have paid lots of claims which would not be paid under the provisions of this act.

Mr. SIMS. Therefore as to the cases that have been dismissed under the Crawford Act there will be fewer judgments than in the old way, if they were left to come up here and be paid by an appropriation by Congress.

Mr. MANN. Undoubtedly there will be fewer of them.

Mr. SIMS. Did not the Court of Claims originally have jurisdiction of any claim against the Government, and did not the legislation during the Civil War requiring the House to send claims to the court, and giving the court jurisdiction, grow out of conditions arising during the Civil War?

Mr. MANN. I do not recall as to the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims of any claims. I think not, though. The Court of Claims does not now have jurisdiction of injury claims.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. I will.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I want to ask the gentleman with reference to the matter of assignment of claims. These claims are all over 50 years old. The French spoliation claims are a hundred years old. The gentleman indicated in response to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] that an assignment would be valid and that the assignee would have an equal standing with the widow or the heir as to these war claims.

Mr. MANN. I think the assignee of a claim would have the same standing as to judgment in those claims as he would have in any other judgment against the United States. But I am not prepared to say what that standing is.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The evil in the bill, if there is any evil in it, so far as I see, is its possible encouragement of claim agents 50 years after the close of the war, after the damage has been done.

Mr. MANN. I think the bill will rather discourage the claim agents. They have been very active. They constitute a considerable corps, and if anything misses them I do not know it.

They have all sorts of claims and get anything they please for prosecuting them. I am not sure but we ought to include in the bill a provision such as we included in the last omnibus bill. In that bill, which became a law, we put a provision that not over 20 per cent should be paid on account of services or advances by agent or attorney, and making it an offense to take more.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Why not a limitation as to the date of assigning?

Mr. MANN. They can not prosecute these claims under assignments. They have to be prosecuted in the name of the original owner.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Of course, we all want to help the widow or the legitimate heir of the original owner of the property, but claim agents——

Mr. MANN. These claims, however much claim agents may be interested in them, are not assigned so far as the assignments appear of record. They can not be prosecuted by the assignees.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. May I ask the gentleman why not?

Mr. GARRETT. There can be no legal assignment until after it is allowed under the general law.

Mr. MANN. I am not sure that that applies to all judgments.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I think that point was raised in connection with the French spoliation claims. I think the gentleman himself discussed the matter of assignments in relation to the French spoliation claims.

Mr. MANN. I think the gentleman is mistaken. In all those claims the findings are always in favor of some estate or descendants of the party who was originally involved.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The findings there had gone to a point where the Government in all fairness ought to pay.

Mr. MANN. Well, that is another proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has again expired.

Mr. MANN. I would like to have two minutes more.

Mr. REAVIS. I yield to the gentleman two minutes more.

Mr. MANN. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. CANNON. Does the bill provide that the court may fix the compensation of the attorney or the claim agent?

Mr. MANN. There is nothing in the bill on that subject.

Mr. CANNON. Ought it not to provide limiting the fee?

Mr. MANN. I am not sure, as I say, that there might not properly be a provision in there on that subject, similar to the one that was put in the last omnibus bill, though I am frank to say I did not include it in the original bill, because I think it is very desirable in the interest of the Government to enact legislation of this kind, and I was afraid that such a provision might at some stage of the proceedings be an obstacle. Somebody might throw dust, not that anyone knowingly would let that affect him.

Mr. CANNON. But is it not true that the history of claim agents in Washington is to milk the people without regard to age or sex or condition?

Mr. MANN. I think that is true.

Mr. CANNON. And therefore should not that privilege be taken from them, unless there is really something in the claim other than the solicitations of the agent?

Mr. MANN. I will be in favor of passing a law in reference to all claims fixing the amount of fees that can be paid to the attorneys or agents. I have no objection to such a provision here.

Mr. GARRETT. On that point will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. MANN. I will if I have any time left.

Mr. GARRETT. This bill provides for the restoration to the docket of the Court of Claims of a large number of claims that were stricken from that docket under the Crawford amendment, in which a proof had already been taken. In those cases contracts had already been entered into between the claimants and the attorneys. I assume now, if I am correctly informed—I have not been into the details of it, or read the opinion in full—but there has been litigation over that amendment that was adopted by the Senate and agreed to by the House, limiting the fee to 20 per cent, and it has been held by one of the courts that in substance Congress could not pass an act which interfered with an existing contract.

Mr. MANN. I know of no limitation in the Constitution which prohibits Congress from interfering with the enforcement of contracts. I do not know what court rendered the opinion, but I am very sure that whatever court did it, it was an erroneous opinion and could not be sustained.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. REAVIS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I do not propose to discuss the details of the bill. I judge that defects may be corrected, if necessary, when the bill is before the House for consideration for that purpose. However, I do desire to call attention to the fact that this bill is a great step in advance in juridical procedure. It will mark, Mr. Chairman, as I believe, one further great step in the administration of justice.

Under the old rule no citizen had a right to bring any action against any Government that claimed the attribute of sovereignty. "The king could do no wrong." The rule was created in the era of the divine right of kings, and it was not recognized that in the relation between the citizen and his Government there was any legal obligation resting upon the Government which had any basis of right in favor of the citizen as against his sovereign. And, Mr. Chairman, when the United States created the Court of Claims, in which it gave to a tribunal the power to pass upon questions of fact and to advise the legislative powers of the Government as to whether a claim was or was not a just claim, that voluntary surrender of sovereignty was held by jurists all over the world as a step forward in the progress of juridical procedure.

And now, Mr. Chairman, we are about to take another step in that forward march. It was impossible for the Court of Claims to enter a judgment against the Government. It was thought at that time as perhaps unwise to go to that extent. The court was only allowed to render a decision as to the merits of the case, but was not allowed to order judgment on that decision against the Government. The Congress still reserved the right to pay the award or to refuse to do so, as it might determine. In many cases claims have been allowed by the Court of Claims that have not been paid by the Government.

That, Mr. Chairman, was never a proper or a just thing to do. When the Government creates courts for the determination of rights between individuals it ought to be willing on its part to submit its causes involving the determination of claims against it to be determined by a judicial tribunal, in accordance with the law and under the evidence, as in like causes between individuals. There can be no claim presented against the Government for determination in the Court of Claims that is not based upon some obligation of the Government resting upon legal grounds. It is only proper and right, it is only fairness and justice, Mr. Chairman, that the Government should submit its causes to an impartial tribunal for determination in the same manner that it requires its citizens to do. If there is a liability on the part of the Government or obligation that would be recognized in the courts as between individuals, we are not doing our full duty in the performance of those obligations to our citizens unless we give to them the right not only to bring their cases for determination in the courts of the land, but also making it obligatory on the part of the Government to pay them. And that great step, Mr. Chairman, is taken in this bill, because the language of the third section is that—

The Court of Claims shall have power to enter judgment upon its findings of fact in the following classes of claims referred to said court.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNER. I will be glad to yield in a moment.

Mr. Chairman, the time will come, as I believe, when Congress will not fritter away its time in discussing these petty claims. The time will come when Congress will decide that all these cases shall be determined in the courts. The time will come when we will not have cast upon us the opprobrium of giving more attention to private claims than we give to the public business. The time will come when Congress will say that all this class of claims shall be determined in a court of justice between the Government and its citizens, just as now we require the adjudication of cases where individuals contest among themselves in the courts that are created in the land.

Now I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. DICKINSON. Does the gentleman contend that if a judgment is rendered, as permitted under this bill, such a judgment will permit process and execution against the Government, just as in the case of a private citizen?

Mr. TOWNER. The gentleman knows very well that no execution can issue against the Government, but it determines finally the right of a claim, and it determines it so that it will be paid. The Supreme Court of the United States in certain classes of cases renders a judgment against a State, but it does not attempt to enforce that judgment if the State refuses to pay. I am not now discussing the power to enforce the right. I am only calling attention to the fact that we are now giving to the Court of Claims the right not only to pass upon questions of fact, but also the power of ordering that a judgment be entered against the Government. There would be no method of compelling the Government to pay the judgment, but that need not be considered.

Mr. DICKINSON. My inquiry was the result of the statement, as I understood it, that it would put a claimant against the Government in the same attitude as against an individual.

Mr. TOWNER. No; not as to enforcement of a judgment.

Mr. DICKINSON. The gentleman's language did not intend to go that far?

Mr. TOWNER. Oh, no; certainly not.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman from Nebraska yield a minute to the gentleman from Iowa to enable me to ask him a question?

Mr. REAVIS. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa one minute, to allow the gentleman from Illinois to ask him a question.

Mr. CANNON. Does the gentleman claim that after a matter has been litigated between a citizen and a sovereign, and the judgment has gone in favor of the Government, it is not perfectly competent for Congress to legislate to pay the claim?

Mr. TOWNER. No one can enforce a judgment against the Government.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman does not quite understand my question. After a judgment has gone against the claimant, Congress still has a free hand to legislate to pay the claim, and has done so in many cases where full settlement has been made, and full receipts have been given.

Mr. TOWNER. Certainly.

Mr. CANNON. Then how are you going to cut out the claim?

Mr. TOWNER. Because Congress will never voluntarily take upon itself the consideration of claims after a law has been passed and a method has been established to avoid taking them up in Congress. We have taken them up only because that has been our bad habit, one that I judge every man here would be glad to be rid of.

Mr. REAVIS. I now yield to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] 10 minutes.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I want to say a word in explanation. I understood the chairman to say that one hour having been consumed in behalf of the bill, recognition would go to anyone who opposed the bill, or otherwise an hour to anyone who asked for recognition. So I immediately said I opposed the bill, if not amended, for the purpose of having an opportunity to discuss in general debate to some extent the provisions of the bill, not knowing that the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] had any time remaining. But as he had only 10 minutes, I think as acting chairman he ought to have kept that for himself. The gentleman [Mr. REAVIS] very kindly agreed to yield to me 10 minutes, and I want it understood that I was not attempting in any way to monopolize the time, because if I had been recognized I would have yielded to the gentleman all of my time except the 10 minutes.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] introduced this bill on the 4th day of January, 1916. On the same day and for the same purpose on January 4 I introduced a bill (H. R. 6907), which I will ask unanimous consent to incorporate in my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to incorporate a certain bill in his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The bill is as follows:

A bill (H. R. 6907) to repeal section 5 of the act entitled "An act making appropriation for payment of certain claims in accordance with findings of the Court of Claims, reported under the provisions of the acts approved March 3, 1883, and March 3, 1887, and commonly known as the Bowman and the Tucker Acts, and under the provisions of section No. 151 of the act approved March 3, 1911, commonly known as the Judicial Code," and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That section 5 of the act entitled "An act making appropriation for payment of certain claims in accordance with findings of the Court of Claims, reported under the provisions of the acts approved March 3, 1883, and March 3, 1887, and commonly known as the Bowman and the Tucker Acts, and under the provisions of section No. 151 of the act approved March 3, 1911, commonly known as the Judicial Code," be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

SEC. 2. That the Court of Claims shall have and take jurisdiction of all claims which were pending before it on March 4, 1915, and whereof it would have had and would have continued to have jurisdiction, but for the provisions of said repealed section, and also of all cases or claims wherein motions for new trial or for amendments of findings of fact made by claimants, had been overruled pro forma prior to March 4, 1915, but with leave or right to renew said motions; that as to such of said claims as may have been heretofore dismissed by said court for want of jurisdiction by reason of the terms of said repealed section, said court shall reinstate the same upon motion in that behalf made by the claimant at any time within two years after the date of this enactment.

SEC. 3. That all evidence or depositions heretofore taken or submitted in said cases or claims, even though taken after March 4, 1915, but prior to the dismissal of said cases or claims by said court, shall be considered as having been legally taken or submitted, notwithstanding the provisions of said repealed section; and, where in any case testimony shall have been taken or submitted, under a reference of the claim to said court by a House of Congress, and it shall have been developed that such reference was in the name of the wrong person, such evidence may be thereafter considered by said court in connection with a claim presented in the name of the proper person, and involving the same subject matter.

SEC. 4. That the Court of Claims shall have the power to enter judgment upon its findings of fact in the following classes of claims heretofore referred to said court under the provisions of the acts approved March 3, 1883, and March 3, 1887, commonly known as the Bowman and the Tucker Acts, or under the provisions of section 151 of the Judicial Code, and in all such claims of the following classes as may be presented to said court by direct petition within two years from date of this enactment, namely:

First. In claims of religious, eleemosynary, educational, or fraternal organizations, for use and occupation of or injury to or destruction of buildings of such organizations, with their contents, and, where not situated at seat of war as heretofore defined by said court, of municipal or county organizations, for such use and occupation or for injury to real estate, by the forces of the United States, during or after the close of the Civil War; in all such claims the judgment, if for the claimant, shall be for the reasonable value of such use and occupation and for injury to such property by reason of such use and occupation, in excess of ordinary wear and tear: Provided, however, That judgment shall not be entered for any claimant in such case for the value of any buildings or other property wantonly destroyed, or for property damaged or destroyed as an incident to actual hostilities.

Second. In claims of individuals, associations, or corporations for stores or supplies furnished to or taken by the military or naval forces of the United States during said war or after the close thereof, including boats seized and used, otherwise than by the naval forces as prize of war, and for use and occupation of real estate by said forces during said war, or continuing after the close of hostilities incident to said war, and not embraced within the general class of claims described in the preceding paragraph; in all such cases the judgment, if for the claimant, shall be for the reasonable value of the stores or supplies so furnished or taken, at current market prices then being paid by the United States, or for the reasonable rental value of such use and occupation, including damages incidental thereto in excess of ordinary wear and tear: Provided, however, That in claims arising prior to the 1st day of May, 1865, the claimant, if a citizen, shall have been found by said court, upon preliminary inquiry, to have given no voluntary aid or comfort to the so-called government of the Confederacy by bearing arms, or serving as an official of said government or of any branch thereof, or voting in favor of secession, or by exchanging money or property for the securities of said government: Provided further, That if such claimant was an alien during said war, he shall have been found upon such preliminary inquiry to have remained neutral during said war, as against the United States; and unless, upon such preliminary inquiry, said court shall so find, then said court shall forthwith dismiss such claim: Provided further, That in cases where the stores or supplies furnished or taken, or the real estate so used and occupied, belonged to an undivided estate of a decedent, whether in the custody of an administrator or executor or not, the persons whose conduct shall be made the subject of such preliminary inquiry shall be the next of kin, distributees, devisees, or legatees of such decedent; and if legal title to such stores, supplies, or real estate was vested in a guardian of any minor, such preliminary inquiry shall relate solely to the conduct of such minor, and, in absence of evidence to the contrary, any minor who was under the age of 17 years on April 9, 1865, shall be presumed to have given no such aid or comfort: Provided further, That section 184 of the Judicial Code, and so much of section 161 of said code as is in conflict herewith, are hereby repealed.

Mr. SIMS. Now, I suppose both the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] and myself had substantially the same purpose in view. Our purpose was first to restore to the dockets of the Court of Claims the war claims that had been sent there by action of the House or Senate, which had been dismissed by the construction placed by the court upon the effect of the Crawford amendment, which has been referred to in this debate.

That same identical amendment was placed on the omnibus war claims bill by the Senate in the Sixty-second Congress, at which time Senator Crawford was chairman of the Committee on Claims in the Senate. It came over to the House, where all the amendments were disagreed to and the bill sent to conference. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LEE], the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. Morse], and myself were the conferees. At that time I took up that amendment and studied it, and had the advice of attorneys as to its effect, and we decided at that time that if the Crawford amendment remained in that bill it would have the identical effect that it finally was held to have by the Court of Claims, after it was incorporated in the omnibus-claims bill that passed the Sixty-third Congress. But the conferees never got to that part of the bill. It was near the end of the bill, and we disagreed as to other items, so that the Crawford amendment never came before the House at that time, and the House did not understand it. Now, I introduced this bill, and its provisions were taken largely from a bill introduced by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. CARLIN] in a former Congress—the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. CARLIN] being on the Committee on the Judiciary—for the purpose of reinstating the claims dismissed by the court's construction of the Crawford amendment, and further to allow war claims to be presented to the Court of Claims by simple petition of the claimant for two years after the passage of the bill. There is the great difference between this bill which is now before us and the bill which I introduced.

In the first place, the Court of Claims would not render final judgment on many of these claims that were dismissed under the Crawford amendment, if they were treated in the usual way, and came to this House and got into the omnibus bill as they have done heretofore. Now, I want to call serious attention to the fact that this bill provides that outside of those dismissed claims, war claims hereafter referred to the court must be referred by action of the House or Senate just as heretofore.

Now, what has been our experience in the past? Some of you have been here long enough to remember. There was a time when the number of claims that might be referred under a Tucker Act resolution was arbitrarily limited to so many to a Member, and he could have no greater number than that during one Congress. These references usually came in in the form of an omnibus Tucker Act resolution, containing as many items as there were claims; and as a matter of course any attempt to delay consideration would exhaust every day when it was in order to consider such claims during an ordinary session of Congress. So by the arbitrary action of Congress it refused to consider more than a limited number. Consequently there was great delay in the presentation of claims, which delay ensued not because of the negligence of the claimants or their attorneys but by the arbitrary action of this House and possibly of the body at the other end of the Capitol. If this bill is passed the claims that went out of the court under the Crawford amendment can upon motion be reinstated, but you can not get consideration by the Court of Claims for any other claim that was not pending and on the docket of the court at that time except by the passage of a resolution, which is the well-known way of having this House or the Senate refer claims. Now, the claimant can not force us to pass a resolution under the Tucker Act. We can do it or let it alone. Public business may at any time prevent the consideration of resolutions under the Tucker Act and prevent sending to the Court of Claims these cases until it is too late. If you are going to open the court, open it in an unhampered way, so as to let in claimants whose claims have not been to the Court of Claims; let them file their petitions in the court and take the case there under the law, and let the court pass final judgment on it as well as those that you restore that had been dismissed.

We are discriminating against these claims for the reason that as to some we are requiring something hereafter to be done by this House or the Senate in order to go to the court. I think very few judgments are going to be rendered by the Court of Claims on any claim brought there hereafter by petition or otherwise. If a considerable number of these claims should be presented to Congress, and Congress refuses to send them to the Court of Claims, the war-claims trouble will be with you in an aggravated form, because the claimants will come here and say, "Why didn't you get our claims before the Court of Claims within the two years?" We would answer simply because the House and Senate would not send them there, or else it was so taken up by public business that it was prevented from sending them.

I think the bill ought to be amended so as to allow all claimants of the character mentioned in the bill to bring suits, file petitions in the Court of Claims, and let it be tried by the court under the law, judgment rendered, final in that case, just as it is or will be on the claims of others covered by this bill. Then we could say to these people afterwards: "You had your two years in which there was no limit, you had two years in which you did not have to go to Congress."

If you leave it like this bill leaves it, requiring the action of Congress in order to go to the court, and that action must be had in two years, as I say, you will have these war claims with us in even a more aggravated form. In two years we have two sessions, one is called the long session, in which there would be some time to consider these cases; but the short session is taken up practically always by public business. Besides, the House is going to be more careful in sending claims to the court to be tried upon which final judgment may be rendered than they were when we simply referred them to the court and they were reported back to us with findings, or at least the House and the Senate ought to be more careful, and we are going to find it impossible to get any great number of claims referred to the Court of Claims if this bill becomes a law unamended.

Mr. GUERNSEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. GUERNSEY. When claims have been passed upon by the Court of Claims, will anything remain for Congress to do other than to appropriate the money to pay them?

Mr. SIMS. Under the bill every judgment will be certified to Congress and go into the sundry civil bill.

Mr. GUERNSEY. And that will be the end of it?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. REAVIS. I will yield the gentlemen two minutes more.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I can not go into the amendments as I expected to, but I appeal to the committee having charge of the bill to so amend this bill that any individual citizen who has a claim of the class mentioned in this bill may file a petition and have it tried in court within two years and not leave it to the mercy of the Congress to be elected, or the present Congress, when important business may prevent them from sending these claims to the Court of Claims. If you do not do it, after it is all over there will be hundreds of bills come in here, and we will be pleaded with to pay them on the ground that we passed a bill promising relief under which relief became practically impossible, and Congress will be blamed.

Mr. OLIVER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. Certainly.

Mr. OLIVER. Do I understand that under the act of March 11, which became effective January 1, 1912, claimants are not now authorized to bring suits in the Court of Claims and have judgment rendered thereon?

Mr. SIMS. The gentleman is referring to the captured and abandoned property act?

Mr. OLIVER. Yes.

Mr. SIMS. This has no effect on those claims. Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to consume any more time. I thank the gentleman from Nebraska for yielding 12 minutes of his time to me.

Mr. REAVIS. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has nine minutes remaining.

Mr. REAVIS. Mr. Chairman, the practice that has heretofore obtained with reference to the disposition of war claims has been luminously explained by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN]. Under the Bowman Act loyalty was jurisdictional. The first question of fact to be determined by the Court of Claims when a claim had been referred to it by the Committee on War Claims was the loyalty of the claimant. The burden of proof of loyalty was on the claimant, and if he failed in assuming that burden the claim was at once dismissed and returned to Congress with the finding of fact that the claimant was disloyal. That, of course, being jurisdictional, it was the ultimate and final determination of that claim.

Under the Tucker Act loyalty was not jurisdictional. I am informed by the Court of Claims, during the several days I spent in searching through those claims in that department of Government, that in a great many instances a claim would be submitted to the Court of Claims from the War Claims Committee under the Bowman Act, where an adverse finding would be made on account of loyalty, and that it would be returned to Congress with an adverse finding; that thereupon the same claim would be filed with the Committee on Claims and referred by the Committee on Claims under the Tucker Act to the Court of Claims, under which act loyalty was not jurisdictional. There ought to be some way devised at some time that would put an end to such practices. This bill provides that way. More than 50 years have elapsed since the cause of action was first created, and the demands are still insistent.

Mr. Chairman, one of the essential objects to be accomplished by this bill is the centralization of responsibility. Practically 10,000 cases arising out of war claims were dismissed upon the motion of the Department of Justice under the Crawford amendment. This bill is devised to reinstate those claims. I have gone over a great many of them, have made personal investigation of a great many of them. I have learned something of the history of how they got into that court, and the most fearful and wonderful thing that I have ever seen pertaining to the practice of law is the average contract signed by those claimants under which they employ their agents or so-called lawyers. The agents and lawyers under such contracts are to receive anywhere up to 50 per cent of the amount of the claim. The contract is champertous in the extreme. It is not enforceable as between the parties, because in every instance where the contract was called to my attention the attorney or the agent agrees to bear all of the expenses incident to the prosecution of the claim, and the claimant shall be put to no expense at all. In half of these cases that were in the Court of Claims where the question was raised by the court as to the authority or power of the agent or attorney to represent the claimant, where demand was made for the production of the power of attorney showing such authority, the only power of attorney that was ever submitted was a contract of the character that I have just described.

Mr. Chairman, as I see that my time is about expired I will ask the gentleman from South Carolina to be good enough to yield to me for a few minutes.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. LOBECK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REAVIS. Yes.

Mr. LOBECK. There are about 2,500 of these claims discarded in this measure for bounties, and so on, are there not?

Mr. REAVIS. That will come up by way of amendment. In many of the cases that were dismissed under the Crawford amendment, the claimant had gone to expense and trouble, under the authority of Congress, under the agreement of Congress, that it would pay the claim if valid. Testimony by way of depositions has been taken, and in some cases that were dismissed the claimant had not only gone to the expense of obtaining the testimony, of presenting the depositions to the court, but the cases had been argued and finally submitted, though taken under advisement by the court itself, when the Crawford amendment was enacted which resulted in a dismissal. I found in my research in the Court of Claims some claims that were valid. I found some men who have claims against this Government that the Government should pay, and this bill is devised for the purpose of reinstating all of the cases, permitting further inquiry to be made, giving them the benefit of testimony that was taken before the dismissal, so that they may be put to no additional expense, and in certain classes of claims to have a final determination by the Court of Claims.

Just one word on that. In allowing these claims heretofore, there has been no central responsibility. The Court of Claims would make a finding of fact. They were merely referees where certain references were made to them from this Congress, from the Committee on War Claims. In some instances they would return conclusions of law, but they had not the responsibility of judgment. It is the experience of all men that no one should be given the power of disposition unless that one should bear the responsibility of that disposition, and it is your experience and mine that a court that does not have the responsibility of judgment does not give the testimony the careful consideration it would if the responsibility of judgment rested upon it. As an illustration of that, there will be presented here an inspired amendment, which will come in the way of a committee amendment, to the effect that wherever the Court of Claims has made a finding of fact with reference to loyalty, nothing in this act shall prevent them from further investigation of the same testimony, nor are they to be bound by their original finding of fact.

What does that mean? It means that when the responsibility of judgment obtains under this bill they are going to be more careful in the investigation of testimony furnished, both on the part of the claimant and on the part of the Government. We are centralizing responsibility; we are getting rid of a great deal of detail with reference to private claims that Congress ought not to be annoyed with at all. We are putting it up to the Court of Claims—reinstate these cases, go through with them, find out from the evidence submitted, first, is the claimant loyal; second, has he a valid claim against the Government, and what is the amount of that claim, and then you take the responsibility of entering judgment. I think the bill for that reason should prevail.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HOUSTON].

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Chairman, I want to call attention to the statute about which some mention has been made, in regard to assignees bringing suit on these claims, and I want to read from that statute that has been the law for many years and let the House understand what it contains. It is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That all transfers and assignments hereafter made of any claim upon the United States, or any part or share thereof, or interest therein, whether absolute or conditional, and whatever may be the consideration therefor, and all powers of attorney, orders, or other authorities for receiving payment of any such claim, or any part or share thereof, shall be absolutely null and void, unless the same shall be freely made and executed in the presence of at least two attesting witnesses, after the allowance of such claim, the ascertainment of the amount due, and the issuing of a warrant for the payment thereof.

Approved February 26, 1853.

I think that statute settles that question. All transfers made of any claim are absolutely void if made before the claim is allowed.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. REAVIS] referred to a condition that virtually obviates the efficiency of that law by the champertous agreements that claim agents enter into with the owners of these claims. Is there anything in the statute books that restricts the amount these claim agents who ferret out these claims can obtain, so as to prevent them from exacting exorbitant fees from the claimant?

Mr. HOUSTON. Well, there is no provision of that kind in this bill that is now pending.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is there any provision of law against it?

Mr. HOUSTON. There was a provision of this kind in the last omnibus bill, perhaps the one before.

Mr. STAFFORD. That failed of passage, did it not?

Mr. HOUSTON. There was a provision of that sort that did pass and became the law and was contested in the Supreme Court of the District here and held to be unconstitutional and void.

Mr. STAFFORD. That only applied to claims as carried in that law, or was it general in its character?

Mr. HOUSTON. It applied alone, I take it, to that bill. Now, the question of an amendment to this bill to cover that might be considered; an amendment to regulate contracts hereafter made would be wise and I would favor it. I do not think there should be any objection to such an amendment.

Mr. STAFFORD. What was the general scope of the provision in that bill? Will the gentleman enlighten the committee?

Mr. GARRETT. Twenty per cent.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Chairman, I want to say one word more, and that is that the general provision of this bill makes no change in the existing law in regard to the character of property that shall be paid for and in regard to the parties who shall be entitled to collect for their property which was taken. It is just the same as the law heretofore. One of the main purposes of this is to expedite the payment of just claims which the Government ought to pay.

Now, we all know how difficult it is to get an omnibus bill through both Houses of Congress. In fact, I might recite from my own district a large number of claims which were found in favor of the claimants by the Court of Claims in 1904, 1905, 1906, and on up, none of which were paid until the passage of the omnibus bill in 1915. We had made every effort to get them paid and had passed a bill providing for their payment through the House twice, I believe. Ten years and more had elapsed before those claimants, who were justly entitled to their money, whose rights had been tried, whose cases had been proven and had been adjudicated in their favor, were paid. There is unavoidable delay in getting bills of this sort through Congress, and this made it impossible for those people to get what they were entitled to as held by the Court of Claims. Now, this will expedite the collecting of these just claims against the Government. The findings and judgments of the Court of Claims will only leave it for an appropriation to be made, and in that way it will expedite their settlement and render relief to a large body of claimants who are clearly entitled to it, and in addition to that it will follow the laws that we have been allowing claims under heretofore.

Now, Mr. Chairman, many of my constituents have just claims for property taken and used by the Federal troops during the Civil War and which come within the requirements of the rule and law established by Congress. When these people have claims which they are entitled to collect under these terms it is a denial of justice to fail to give them the right to have these claims adjudicated and settled. To compel claimants to wait 8, 10, and 11 years after their cases have been tried and decided in their favor is not fair and is not just. This bill, if it becomes a law, will in a great measure prevent this injustice.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired, all time has expired, and the Clerk will read the bill.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent, before reading section 1 of the bill, that the two amendments proposed by the committee as sections 1 and 2 may be read and considered section by section.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that sections 1 and 2, proposed by the committee as amendments, shall be first considered. Is there objection?

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, will not the gentleman also include in that section 5, to be read in its order; that is a new section which the committee put in?

Mr. MANN. That would come in in its order anyhow.

Mr. GARRETT. That is an amendment.

Mr. MANN. That would come in in its proper place when it is read, ordinarily.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the title of the bill, insert the following as an amendment:
"Be it enacted, etc., That section 5 of the act approved March 4, 1915, entitled 'An act making appropriations for the payment of certain claims in accordance with findings of the Court of Claims, reported under the provisions of the acts approved March 3, 1883, and March 3, 1887, and commonly known as the Bowman and the Tucker Acts, and under the provisions of section 151 of the act approved March 3, 1911, commonly known as the Judicial Code,' be, and the same is hereby, repealed."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk reads as follows:

Insert on page 2, as section 2, as follows:
"SEC. 2. That all suits in the Court of Claims which have heretofore been dismissed by the said court by reason of the provisions of section 5 of the said act shall, on motion of the claimants, be reinstated on the docket of the said court and proceeded with according to law, and that all evidence or depositions heretofore taken or submitted in said cases or claims, even though taken after March 4, 1915, but prior to the dismissal of said cases or claims by said court, shall be considered as having been legally taken or submitted, notwithstanding the provisions of said repealed section."

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I wish to offer an amendment to the committee amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the committee amendment by inserting, on page 2, in line 7, after the word "claimants," the following: "made or filed within one year from the passage of this act."

Mr. SIMS. I want to ask the gentleman from South Carolina this question. Section 2, line 4, says:

That all suits in the Court of Claims—

And so forth.

Has the gentleman examined so as to know whether or not these cases sent to the Court of Claims by reference from either House of Congress are regarded as "suits"? In other words, does the word "suits" here correctly describe it? This language only authorizes them to reinstate "suits"? I have not examined the legal phraseology and I do not know.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. What is the opinion of the gentleman?

Mr. SIMS. They are referred to the Court of Claims for a report. These claims are referred by action of the two Houses of Congess for a report on the law and the facts. Now, if that language describes what we intend to mean, of course it is all right. What follows seems to indicate that is what it means.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. It means all cases or claims sent there.

Mr. SIMS. I want to ask the gentleman further: In the gentleman's amendment which is now pending, why does he limit it to one year?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I will say to the gentleman that the committee is actuated by its desire to limit the time for the reason that under the language of section 2 in the bill there is no limit, while a limit is placed upon the time in which the case can be sent under the provisions of the original bill; three years from now or five years from now every claimant whose claim was dismissed under the corporate amendment might come in and ask for a reinstatement.

Mr. SIMS. Why not make it two years instead of one, so as to harmonize with the other provision?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. The Committee thought that it was in a different situation. It can be presumed that there is in the country some man who thinks he has a claim against the Government who might not hear of the passage of this bill for some time, and there may be a man who has a case pending in the Court of Claims that ought to have been prosecuted—the right given to him by Congress to present his claim to that court—and he is not in the same fix as the man who knows nothing about the passage of the bill.

Mr. SIMS. That is certainly a strong statement, but the gentleman will remember we have referred claims down there, and they stay until they are dismissed, and there is no prosecution of them, and afterwards the claimants come in and we send the claims down again.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. That is true; and when a case is referred there, and the claimant does not for years come in and prosecute his case, Congress ought not to refer it to that court again.

Mr. SIMS. In other words, he has slept on his own rights after they were given to him?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the committee to section 2.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. REAVIS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment to section 2.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by adding, after the word "section," in line 14 of section 2, on page 2, the following:

"Provided, That this act shall not be construed to confer jurisdiction upon the Court of Claims to reinstate, hear, or determine any claim for reimbursement for money used to employ substitutes for military service in the Civil War."

Mr. REAVIS. Mr. Chairman, I am authorized to present that amendment as a committee amendment, and it arises out of the following condition:

In looking over the cases that were dismissed from the Court of Claims I encountered 2,096 claims from the State of Kentucky where the Government in 1864 sought to draft some of the citizens in that State into the northern Army. They resisted the draft and employed substitutes, at a cost of $300 apiece. Two thousand and ninety-six of those who employed substitutes for such military service are now before the Court of Claims, their claims being handled by one lawyer, for the purpose of being reimbursed for the money they were compelled to pay these substitutes for such military service. The theory is that the Government had no right to so conscript.

Mr. Chairman, I am not in favor of opening up the Treasury of this country to the rapacity of any man who in the hours of the country's peril refused to defend it. I am not in favor, Mr. Chairman, of giving any consideration to a claim that is founded either upon disloyalty or upon cowardice or upon both. I therefore ask for the adoption of the amendment.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Nebraska yield?

Mr. REAVIS. I will.

Mr. MANN. I take it that under the provisions of this bill the court could not enter judgment in that class of cases in any event?

Mr. REAVIS. No, sir.

Mr. MANN. So the gentleman's amendment is to prevent the refiling of these claims which have been dismissed?

Mr. REAVIS. Yes, sir; and the amendment so provides. Probably the word "determination" in that amendment is redundant. But in any event the amendment is broad enough and sweeping enough to dispose of these cases summarily.

Mr. MANN. The only reason I asked the question was so that the Members of the House would understand that the bill would not authorize judgment in any case except those specifically provided for in the bill, and there would be no misunderstanding. The amendment, of course, is a proper amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the committee amendment offered by the gentleman from Nebraska to section 2.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend the committee amendment by striking out, on line 8, page 2, the words "according to law."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 2, in line 8 of the committee amendment, by striking out the words "according to law."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the adoption of section 2 as amended.

Mr. SIMS. Has the amendment of the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. REAVIS] been acted upon?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes, sir; it has been adopted.

Mr. SIMS. I wanted to offer an amendment to that section.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman can present the amendment.

Mr. SIMS. I wish to offer the following amendment:

On page 2, in line 14, after the word "section," strike out the period and insert a colon; to be followed by the following words: "Provided, That the terms of this section shall also apply to cases wherein a motion for new trial or for amendment of findings of fact had been made by the claimant, which motion had been overruled or denied without argument, prior to March 3, 1915, but with leave or right to the claimant to renew said motion."

The CHAIRMAN. The provision which was placed in this section by the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. REAVIS] or the committee immediately follows the section.

Mr. SIMS. Then, I will say "at the end of the section as amended."

The CHAIRMAN. It has already been put in.

Mr. SIMS. I only want to amend that section.

The CHAIRMAN. The section was amended, but the last word was not "section."

Mr. SIMS. I wrote my amendment before the amendment offered by the gentleman from Nebraska was adopted. It reads:

Provided, That the terms of this section shall also apply to cases wherein a motion for new trial or for amendment of findings of fact had been made by the claimant, which motion had been overruled or denied without argument, prior to March 3, 1915, but with leave or right to the claimant to renew said motion.

It provides for preserving the right to have a motion for retrial considered where it has been made and has not been acted upon. I submit it to the committee as to whether or not there is any objection to it? I know of some cases which are in that condition. They have been decided adversely to the claimants, and motions have been made for a rehearing or a new trial, which are pending and have been dismissed.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Tennessee send his amendment to the Clerk's desk?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I will say to the gentleman from Tennessee that I believe the language of the bill now covers that.

Mr. SIMS. That is what I wanted to know.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. That is our idea of the language in this section.

Mr. SIMS. If the section covers it, of course there is no use for the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, upon the statement of the chairman of the committee that the committee thinks it is already covered, I will withdraw the amendment.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out, on page 2, the words "and proceeded with according to law."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, in line 8, strike out the words "and proceeded with according to law."

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that that has already been acted upon.

The CHAIRMAN. Part of the amendment has been acted upon.

Mr. BENNET. Yes; but under the uniform rulings of the House for 50 years, including one by Mr. Speaker Blaine, it is not subject to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is overruled.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I have not any particular zeal about the amendment, but simply want to call the attention of the committee to the fact that the words "according to law" are absolutely redundant. If a case is reinstated on the docket of the court and the court is directed to proceed, it can proceed in only one way. It is hardly necessary to tell those dignified and distinguished gentlemen composing the court that they must proceed according to law, and I do not think it confers very much credit upon our House to leave those words in.

Once in a while we do pass a ridiculous statute. I was looking over the statutes the other day and found one that was passed in the Fifty-ninth Congress, where we provided that "no sponge could be sold in any port or place in the United States less than 4 inches in diameter." [Laughter.] I do not know what particular State contains that port or place. When we are passing statutes, why not try to have the English as good as possible?

While it would require unanimous consent under the present parliamentary condition to strike out the words "according to law," I submit to the committee that it having been brought to their attention, it would possibly not do any harm to ask unanimous consent.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BENNET. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Has this court any equitable jurisdiction?

Mr. BENNET. None except what is conferred upon it by statute.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Then it is a court of law.

Mr. BENNET. It is a Court of Claims, proceeding under a jurisdiction conferred and altered from time to time by Congress.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Which makes it a court of law.

Mr. BENNET. Not necessarily.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Under that language, might not the court consider that they had equitable jurisdiction, and proceed accordingly to deal with claims not intended by Congress to be dealt with?

Mr. BENNET. If they did their action would be an absolute nullity.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Who is to declare it a nullity?

Mr. BENNET. I would not undertake to say offhand.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. It would absolutely shut off all right of appeal under this bill.

Mr. BENNET. You do not cut off the right of the Comptroller of the Treasury to refuse to pay money out of the Treasury that is attempted to be gotten out of it in violation of law, and I undertake to say that if they started in to-day, having no jurisdiction to perform any act as to which jurisdiction has not been conferred and to render judgment, they would never get the money out of the Treasury, and it is absolutely unnecessary to say "according to law." That is the only way to proceed, anyway.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. What injurious effects would result from the words remaining in the bill?

Mr. BENNET. Only that the House, composed largely of lawyers, ought not to put any unnecessary words in a statute.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Of course, we ought to be concise and we are enacting a law that the court established by statute shall proceed in accordance with the law that we establish.

Mr. BENNET. That is the only way they could proceed anyway.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Does the gentleman know of any particular part, other than this, where they are directed to proceed?

Mr. BENNET. The entire remainder of the bill is a direction to proceed.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. A direction to proceed?

Mr. BENNET. I have no objection to the direction to proceed; but when you direct them to proceed, they can proceed only in accordance with law. But I have some doubts, Mr. Chairman, as to whether the words "and proceeded with" should be stricken out, and I ask unanimous consent, therefore, to withdraw the present amendment, having called the attention of the committee to the situation.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET] asks unanimous consent to withdraw his amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, so that the court will not think, because the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK] and the gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET] were not just for the moment familiar with section 151 of the Judicial Code, which expressly requires the court to ascertain the amount either legally or equitably due the claimant, that no one else in the House knew that that provision was in the law. I will say that all the rest of the House is presumed to be familiar with the fact that under section 151 the court is compelled to find either the amount legally due or the amount equitably due to the claimant.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, the statement of the gentleman from Illinois is not at all in conflict with anything I said, and I restate my position, which is, that the Court of Claims is the court which can exercise any jurisdiction conferred upon it by Congress. I withdrew my first hasty statement to the gentleman from Florida, that it was not a court of equitable jurisdiction, I will be frank to say, not having in mind the exact language that has been read, but having in mind the fact that the Congress could confer upon the Court of Claims—there being nothing in the Constitution to the contrary—the precise jurisdiction that is conferred in section 151.

Mr. MANN. I did not mean to be understood as saying that there was anything in the statute in contradiction with what the gentleman said; but the court may read this debate hereafter, and they might think we are not familiar with that provision of the law.

Mr. BENNET. If this fixes the salaries of the judges, I am sure they will read it. If it fixes only their jurisdiction, I doubt if they would read it. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. The court is not composed of salary grabbers, as the gentleman no doubt knows.

Mr. BENNET. I believe that.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. That the Court of Claims shall have power to enter judgment upon its findings of fact in the following classes of claims referred to said court under the provisions of section 1 of the act of March 3, 1883 (Stat. L., vol. 22, p. 485), commonly called the Bowman Act, or section 14 of the act of March 3, 1887 (Stat. L., vol. 24, p. 507), commonly known as the Tucker Act, or section 151 of the Judicial Code.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, if there be any question about considering this section by paragraphs, I will ask unanimous consent that it may be considered paragraph by paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not think there is any question about that.

Mr. MANN. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, that this section be considered paragraph by paragraph. There may be some amendments that will be offered.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, on page 2, by inserting at the beginning of line 13 the words "section 3."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, line 2, after the word "Code," insert the following: "And judgments so rendered by the court shall be final and conclusive, without any right of appeal by either party."

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, I wish to state that this amendment which is offered is not a committee amendment.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. It is offered as a committee amendment.

Mr. WATKINS. Then I will not oppose it, if that is the case, because I intend to stand by the action of the committee, though I did oppose this amendment in the committee, and I did not know that the committee had voted it up. I thought they had voted it down.

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I am very glad indeed that the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. WATKINS] does not desire to oppose this amendment. I think it ought by all means to be adopted. If there is anything that the United States has been criticized for it is the failure of the Government of the United States promptly to meet and discharge its obligations. Many claims have piled up against the Government. Time flies, and still the Government does not pay. It demands prompt payment from its citizens and obliges them to respond, and if they do not do so the machinery of the law is put into force and effect to require them to do so. When the Government requires exact justice and prompt payment from its citizens, it ought to pay promptly any just obligation it has. Therefore I think this amendment certainly ought to be adopted and enforced after it is adopted, and the payment of just claims against the Government thereby expedited. "Uncle Sam" ought to pay promptly his just debts, and if he fails or refuses to do so he ought, in justice to his debtors, his citizens, to be required promptly to do so. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES].

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

First. In claims for use and occupation of buildings and their contents and appurtenances belonging to religious, eleemosynary, educational, or fraternal organizations, and, where not at the seat of war, to municipal and county organizations, by occupation by the United States military forces during the Civil War, or continuing after the close thereof, the judgment, if in favor of such organization, to be for the value of the use and occupation of its property by reason of such military use and occupation.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 3, line 8, after the word "military," insert the words "or naval."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, have the committee offered all the amendments which they desire to offer to this paragraph?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Yes.

Mr. SIMS. I want to offer an amendment, on page 3, line 10, to insert, after the words "occupation of" the words "and incidental injury to," so that it will read:

The judgment, if in favor of such organization, shall be for the value of the use and occupation of and incidental injury to its property by reason of such military use and occupation.

I do not know whether the committee are willing to accept that amendment or not. The incidental damage exceeds mere rent. I know we have often included it in bills which have been passed heretofore.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. The committee have not considered this, but my recollection is that in all the bills referring cases to the Court of Claims that language has been used.

Mr. SIMS. This simply includes incidental injury as well as use.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 3, in line 10, after the word "of," insert "and incidental injury to."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I hope this amendment will not be agreed to. The bill authorizes a judgment for the value of the use and occupation of the property. That is all we expect to pay. When you talk about incidental injury, that may be the destruction of the property by reason of war. Nobody knows. Nobody can tell what it means. I am utterly unwilling to accept, as far as I can prevent, an amendment of that sort going into the bill. It absolutely destroys the value of the bill. It may be that the court, in determining the value of the use and occupation, will take into consideration ordinary wear and tear of the property, but it is the value of the use and occupation that the court finds. When you propose to add to that the damage or destruction of the property, you open up a field that is as broad as the air and as high as the sky, and it ought not to be done. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] has been one of those who in the past have protected the House from this very character of claims. The value of the use and occupation is all that the Government ought to be called upon to pay.

Mr. FOSTER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. FOSTER. If the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee should be adopted, would it not open up hundreds of millions of dollars of claims?

Mr. MANN. I think if the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee is adopted, the bill will be blown through the ceiling.

Mr. FOSTER. I think we ought to blow it through the ceiling if this amendment is adopted.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I wish to explain the object and purpose of this amendment. I know the theory on which these claims are paid is that the measure of damage is the measure of benefit to the Government, and, as a general rule, it is the benefit that the Government receives and not the injury that the individual or corporation sustains. But use and occupation may be ordinary or extraordinary. To use a church, a schoolhouse, or a college simply as a place for soldiers to sleep in, or be sheltered in the ordinary way, may cause very slight damage, while the benefits to the Government resulting from the use may be very considerable. On the other hand, the use, even if very temporary, might have been worth very little, but the building might have been used for a hospital or have been used in such a way as to almost destroy it. In other words, the damage sustained may far exceed the mere rental value for ordinary purposes. Where the damage comes about as an act of war, or as an act of vandalism, where soldiers break out the windows just for the sake of breaking them, I concede that is of no benefit to the Government. The purpose is to pay for the use; but such use may have been of very little value to the Government, but the damage very great, by reason of it having been very rough and destructive use. Such things did occur. A troop of soldiers would so use a building as to damage it very greatly, and yet not go to the extent of constituting vandalism. It was carelessness, and all that sort of thing, and it does seem to me that the court might have discretion to include incidental injury due to the use and not due to vandalism or to a mere accident or incident of war.

Mr. MANN. Any injury was incidental to the use.

Mr. SIMS. Oh, certainly; that is true.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I wish to express the hope that the committee will not agree to the amendment.

Mr. SIMS. I do not want to go against the judgment of the committee. When I offered this amendment I did not know but that it would meet with the approval of the committee. If it does not meet with the approval of the committee, then, of course, I do not insist on it being adopted.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I will say to the gentleman from Tennessee that I believe that under the act——

Mr. SIMS. To save further time, I will ask unanimous consent to withdraw the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to withdraw his amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Second. In claims for stores or supplies furnished to or taken by the United States military or naval forces during the Civil War for their use, and in claims for use and occupation of real estate by said forces during said war, not embraced within the foregoing class, the judgment, if in favor of the claimant, to be for the value of the property so furnished or taken, or for the value of such use and occupation: Provided, That prior to the entry of judgment said court shall have found on preliminary inquiry, in claims arising prior to the close of hostilities, that the person who furnished such supplies or stores, or from whom they were taken, or the person whose real estate was used and occupied as aforesaid, did not give any aid or comfort to the rebellion, and, if such person was a citizen of the United States, that he was throughout said war loyal to the Government of the United States, and unless on such preliminary inquiry said court shall so find, said court shall not have jurisdiction to render judgment in such case, and the same shall without further proceedings be dismissed: Provided further, That in cases where stores or supplies were taken from an undivided estate of a decedent, whether in the custody of an administrator or executor or not, the person whose loyalty shall be the subject of such preliminary inquiry under the provisions of this paragraph shall be the next of kin, distributees, or legatees of such decedent.

The Clerk read the following committee amendment.

Page 3, line 24, strike out the word "rebellion" and insert the words "Southern Confederacy."

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment which I think ought to be considered at this point.

Mr. MANN. Is it in connection with the committee amendment?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. It is an amendment to the committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Substitute for the committee amendment the following: On page 3, beginning in line 24, strike out the following language: "did not give any aid or comfort to the rebellion, and if such person was a citizen of the United States, that he"——

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. That does not in any way affect the provision of loyalty. The language stricken out is simply surplusage. If the amendment is agreed to the bill will read—or the person whose real estate was used and occupied as aforesaid was throughout said war loyal to the Government of the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment to the committee amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The committee amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, line 16, after the word "class," insert the following: "and not growing out of movement or temporary encampment of troops."

Mr. MANN. I think the word "handling" was in that amendment. Was it left out advisedly?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. The committee considered that, and after careful consideration it was decided that the amendment as sent to the desk was better to cover the situation. Its purpose is to specifically define the liability that Congress desires to attach to the Government.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I have another amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 4, line 11, after the word "decedent," insert the following: "In any of the cases which under the provisions of this act the court is authorized to render judgment, and said judgment shall be adverse to the claimant, it shall not be necessary for the court to file the finding of fact, but the case shall be dismissed."

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. It is to save unnecessary expense that would be involved in having the court print its statement in dismissing the innumerable cases on the docket.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 3, line 14, after the word "claim," insert the following: "of private individuals."

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I would like to say to the House that the purpose of that amendment is in line with the other to specifically provide for the liability of the Government. The Court of Claims has found great difficulty in the few cases it has had under consideration, where the claimant was a corporation, in passing on the question of loyalty or disloyalty of the corporation. As a matter of fact, there are very few cases that could possibly be affected by that, because at the time these causes of action arose there were very few corporations.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "individuals" in the amendment just adopted, strike out the word "for" where it occurs next to the last word and insert "growing out of the."

The CHAIRMAN. Is that a committee amendment?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. No, Mr. Chairman. The committee can not agree to that. It is even broader than the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee and would include all damage and destruction of any kind that grew out of the use and occupation. It is the same question that was discussed a short time ago, the amendment being finally withdrawn by the gentleman from Tennessee. The language proposed is that all damages growing out of the use and occupation shall be paid for and would be broader than any language heretofore suggested.

Mr. MANN. It would cover everything under the sun.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Everything.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. QUIN].

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. That the power to render judgment under the foregoing section shall extend to claims of the class aforesaid in which findings of fact have already been made or transmitted to Congress, and for which no appropriation has been made, as well as to such claims now pending in said court, and to claims of the class aforesaid which may be hereafter referred to said court under any act of Congress.

With the following committee amendment:

At the beginning of line 12, page 4, strike out "Sec. 2" and insert "Sec. 4."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The CHAIRMAN. Is it a committee amendment?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. No; it is not a committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 4, line 17, after the word "which" insert the words "have been or."

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of that amendment is this: As stated by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] and others during the general debate, the purpose of the bill is to empower the Court of Claims to render final judgment in cases referred to it under the terms of this bill, and also in the cases restored to the docket of the court which were dismissed by the Crawford amendment. I think it necessary to insert that language in order to accomplish that, and I therefore ask that the amendment be agreed to. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois that the section provides—

That the power to render judgment under the foregoing section shall extend to claims of the class aforesaid in which findings of fact have already been made or transmitted to Congress.

As a matter of fact, that would include but very few findings, for the reason that since the passage of the omnibus bill in the last Congress the court dismissed all of the cases on the docket, and there are practically no findings that would come under that section.

Mr. MANN. What cases are there which have been referred to the Court of Claims which are not already covered by this section?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. The section covers those that are pending, but as a matter of fact there are none pending, for they have all been dismissed.

The language "as well as to such claims now pending in said court," I take it, was intended to cover what I propose to cover by this amendment, but the fact that the court dismissed those cases leaves it so that there are none now pending, and the addition of the words "have been or" would empower the court to render judgment in those cases which are not pending but which will be pending if this bill is passed.

Mr. MANN. Suppose the court has dismissed a case which is not authorized to be reinstated under the terms of this act. Would not that permit that case to be reinstated?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. No; because the language says "the power to render judgment under the foregoing section."

Mr. MANN. That is, the power to render judgment.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Yes.

Mr. MANN. That is the only place where there is any power to render judgment.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. "The foregoing section" covers the class of cases. The purpose is simply to make sure that the court will have power and will finally adjudicate the cases that are restored under this bill to the docket and not send them back to Congress to be acted upon again. After considering the matter I became satisfied that that was the only way we could give them that power.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman is satisfied I do not raise any question.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I now offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 4, line 19, after the word "Congress" insert "but findings heretofore made shall not prevent a reexamination of the case by the court at the instance of either party."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I wish to offer an amendment, but the amendment of the gentleman from South Carolina having been adopted it changes the arrangement of my amendment somewhat. I understand the amendment of the gentleman from South Carolina strikes out the period.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Automatically, I suppose.

Mr. SIMS. My amendment comes after the word "Congress" and before the amendment just adopted, and is to insert these words:

And to all claims of the classes aforesaid which shall be presented to said court by direct petition within two years after the passage of this act.

That follows the word "Congress," striking out the comma, and immediately preceding the last amendment adopted. Mr. Chairman, I do not care really to discuss the matter, but——

Mr. STAFFORD. Let the amendment be reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 4, at the end of line 19, after the word "Congress" and before the amendment just adopted, insert, in line 19, "and to all claims of the classes aforesaid which shall be presented to said court by direct petition within two years after the passage of this act."

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, this simply would be a repetition of the remarks I made a while ago, but as the House was very thinly populated at that time I will repeat a little. I do not know whether the gentleman from Illinois was in or not.

Mr. MANN. I have been here.

Mr. SIMS. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I do not think the gentleman is ever out, and I do not desire to do him an injustice. Mr. Chairman, the object of this amendment is that persons who have claims, and they are not embraced in the claims which were dismissed by reason of the Crawford amendment, instead of coming to the House of Representatives or to the Senate and having them referred under the Tucker Act or the provisions of the law as it now exists, may file a petition in the court directly, and the court proceed just as though it was sent there under a reference from either of the two Houses. As I stated before, the reasons are that it is within the power of Congress, or its right, to prevent any further reference of claims at all, except those that are there by reason of former references, thus opening the doors of the court only conditionally—that is, provided you can get Congress afterwards to refer the claim. This will give the people an opportunity, without having to depend upon whether they can get a resolution reported by the committee and then adopted by either of the Houses and then have to proceed afterwards to a regular trial of the case within the two years—this amendment will enable them to go to the court immediately, and then there will certainly be no excuse for them to come to Congress and ask us after two years to send the case to the Court of Claims by way of a resolution or an act of Congress. I think this is the best way to wind up and get rid of these war claims in a just and liberal manner.

I have offered this amendment seriously and in sympathy with the bill which is before the committee. I want to give those who have not come to Congress an opportunity to go to the court without coming to Congress; and I am satisfied that every petition that is filed without coming to Congress will certainly not stand any higher in the court or have any advantage over those that have been sent there by action of either House of Congress. We know how difficult it is now. These are private bills and resolutions, and when matters of great public importance are pending such resolutions are not considered, and with a great number of paragraphs in a resolution referring claims to the court, by what we call a filibuster, it is possible to take up all of Fridays and use them entirely in the consideration of a single resolution. There can be within two years but two long sessions of Congress, and the short sessions amount to nothing, as far as private business is concerned. It seems to me we are holding out a hope and yet breaking it by providing a condition by which they can go to the court which may make it impossible to get to the court. This amendment will relieve the House of having to consider these resolutions and permit the court to render final judgments, and with the bill as now amended, without even an appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States or anywhere else, I am confident that people will get nothing more than justice in the way of liberal treatment that may come by way of petition. [Applause.]

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Chairman, during my long association with the gentleman from Tennessee on this committee I have always been in hearty accord with him in respect to the payment of these deserving measures, and I want to bring to him and the other members of the committee a message from their old friend and chairman up in Pennsylvania, Thad. M. Mahon, that patriotic, loyal American. [Applause.] He has always told me that it was a disappointment, if not a sorrow, of his long and distinguished service here in Congress that the Government was so derelict in paying its honest debts, and I want to congratulate the committee upon its ability to frame a measure that now looks to the final accomplishment of the high purposes of that grand old commoner, my friend and your friend, of the seventeenth district. I am disappointed myself, however, Mr. Chairman, that there has apparently been no way by which the people living along the border line of Pennsylvania can be compensated for the enormous destruction of property during the invasion of Pennsylvania on June 30, 1864, when Gen. McCausland ordered Gilmore, his torchbearer, to set fire to the beautiful town of Chambersburg, two-thirds of which was consumed. It seems to have been impossible to get a bill through to relieve the people, although it is a most extraordinary and exceptional case from the fact that the men in that section of the State were at the time here in Washington defending the Capital, and consequently the town was uncovered and left defenseless, excepting by women and children. That was one of the high purposes of Mr. Mahon, to secure reimbursement, as well as to see the people of the South, or wherever they may live, who have honest claims against the Government, receive payment for the same. At an early time I hope there may be a changed condition and a changed opinion and just conception in regard to these border claims and that this House will feel justified in permitting such a bill as I may offer to be passed. Again congratulating my friends, let me assure you that I will carry back to Thaddeus Mahon, who so long served as chairman of the Committee on War Claims, that most gratifying news that you are going to pay the bills the Government honestly owes, and I know that in these later years of life it will be a joy and a happiness to him as he sits by the fireside and hearthstone of his beautiful country seat in Franklin County, Pa. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I ask permission to extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I trust the amendment will not be agreed to. The history of this resolution referring claims to the court for consideration does not justify the belief that any claimant who has a prima facie case would be denied the right to prove that case in the Court of Claims. Certainly, since the Sixty-second Congress, I know that there has never been any opposition in this House to the resolutions referring claims to that court for consideration. We have no reason to believe that in this term of two years, during which a claimant can come to his Member of Congress and ask for the introduction of a bill, a change will come over this House that would cause them to deny the right of that claimant to the consideration of his bill in the court. Now, in addition to that, the court is entitled to some protection at our hands. When the resolution is submitted to them, referring claims for consideration, they know, at least, that the committee has made an investigation and come to the conclusion that the allegations of that bill are such that if true would constitute a valid claim against the Government, and that it has made a prima facie investigation. If that is not done, it means that any man throughout the country who thinks he has a claim can come into the court, the dockets are burdened, and not until the facts are proved, and the time of the court is taken up, is it discovered that he has not the semblance of a claim against the Government. In practical operation it would mean that attorneys in the city of Washington who are engaged in the business would solicit these claims, filing innumerable petitions that would demand the consideration of that court, and in demanding it would block the efforts of any claimant who has a just and meritorious claim and deny him the privilege of presenting it. I do not think it will accomplish anything that this bill does not now give to a claimant who has a just claim, and I believe, on the other hand, it would prove a burden to that court. For that reason I ask that it be not agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. That no claim for the use or occupation of property during the Civil War shall be referred to said court after the expiration of two years from the passage of this act.

Also the following committee amendment was read:

Amend, on page 4, by striking out all of section 3, from lines 20 to 23, inclusive, reading as follows:

"SEC. 3. That no claim for the use or occupation of property during the Civil War shall be referred to said court after the expiration of two years from the passage of this act."

Mr. MANN. The amendment is to strike out that and insert section 5.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the addition to the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

And insert the following:

"SEC. 5. That the Court of Claims shall have no jurisdiction over any claim referred to said court after the expiration of two years from the passage of this act under the provisions of this act, or over any claim for the use and occupation of property, or for stores and supplies taken, which may be referred to said court after the expiration of said time under the provisions of section 151 of the act approved March 3, 1911, commonly known as the Judicial Code."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the committee to strike out section 3 and insert the committee amendment, section 5.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. That in the settlement of all claims embraced within the foregoing provisions, where the person, not being an association or corporation, from whom the property was taken is dead and the amount due is less than $500 and no demand is presented by a duly executor or administrator, the court may allow the amount found due to the widow, if there is a widow, and if the decedent left no widow, or the widow is dead at the date of entry of judgment, then to the children or to their issue per stirpes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the other committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 5, line 10, by striking out "Section 4" and inserting "Section 6."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the committee.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Also the following committee amendment was read:

Page 5, after the word "taken," in line 13, insert "or whose property was used and occupied."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the committee amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Also the following committee amendment was read:

In line 14 strike out the dollar sign and the figures "500" and insert the words "five hundred dollars."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment which I wish to have read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 5, line 15, after the word "duly," insert the word "qualified."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I have no objection to the word "qualified," but I think probably it ought to be as it was in the bill, namely, "appointed." This is an error of the Printing Office, and we do not often get an error from the Printing Office through the proof readers, but the bill as introduced said "by a duly appointed executor or administrator."

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I ask unanimous consent to withdraw that amendment and offer in place thereof to amend by adding the word "appointed" after the word "duly."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert, after the word "duly," in line 15, the word "appointed."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. REAVIS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 5, after section 6, add the following new section:

"SEC. 7. That it shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum which in the aggregate exceeds 20 per cent of the amount recovered, for services rendered, and any contract executed after the passage of this act providing for compensation in any sum exceeding said 20 per cent shall be void. Any person violating the provisions of this section by exacting, collecting, withholding, or receiving any sum in excess of said 20 per cent shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000."

Mr. REAVIS. The sole purpose of that amendment, Mr. Chairman, is the preventing, so far as possible, these claim agents and attorneys from exacting the tremendous compensation that most of their contracts call for. I would be very glad indeed if it were possible to make void the contracts already made; but, believing that to be impossible, I have proposed the amendment, so that any contracts made in the future for compensation exceeding 20 per cent of the net sum received shall be void.

I would like exceedingly if the committee would accept that as a committee amendment.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. REAVIS. I will.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. While I see the force of what the gentleman has just stated with reference to contracts previously made, would it be possible to make this amendment apply to all sums which may be recovered by virtue of this act?

Mr. REAVIS. Well, I have incorporated in that amendment the provision that anyone who shall receive or accept or withhold more than 20 per cent of the net amount received shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and that contracts made in the future or subsequent to the passage of this act shall be declared void. I think that is as far as we can go.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. So that the gentleman thinks that as the amendment now stands it would cover the matter I have referred to?

Mr. REAVIS. So far as punishment is concerned, yes. But it would only cover the contractual matter made after the passage of this act.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Nebraska yield to the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. REAVIS. I do.

Mr. SIMS. Is it intended that this amendment will apply to cases that are now out of court and which may be reinstated?

Mr. REAVIS. The purpose of the amendment is to prevent these sharks from robbing these people on any cases in court or cases hereafter to get into court.

Mr. SIMS. Many of these cases that have been dismissed have to be taken up again and the work done under contracts previously made providing for a greater fee than the gentleman's amendment permits?

Mr. REAVIS. Yes.

Mr. SIMS. Now, if they are reinstated, and the attorneys go to work, under contracts previously made, would the gentleman's amendment make invalid their contracts?

Mr. REAVIS. It would make it a misdemeanor to collect any sum exceeding 20 per cent.

Mr. SIMS. In other words, an attorney receiving more than 20 per cent would be subject to the penalty?

Mr. REAVIS. Yes.

Mr. SIMS. For work done under a previous contract?

Mr. REAVIS. Yes.

Mr. SIMS. Does the gentleman think it ought to be made a misdemeanor to comply with the contract after the work is all done? Of course, as to future work, I heartily agree with the gentleman.

Mr. REAVIS. These cases are of a class. A case is brought in behalf of 2,096 people. Just one of those cases has been tried. That is merely an illustration I am using to answer the gentleman's question. Now, just one of those cases is tried, and 1,999 of them are never tried; and when you consider that a man gets 20 per cent on 2,096 cases after having tried only one case, you must realize that he is already well paid.

Mr. SIMS. All these cases that have been dismissed are of the classes covered by this bill, for expenses furnished, where the attorney has the contract and has done the work, and the party making the contract was sui juris, not acting as administrator or executor. Would you make a penalty against such an attorney for exacting his fee?

Mr. REAVIS. I would; and just such a contract is made in most of these cases, and it is absolutely void. No attorney can agree to pay the expenses of his client and the court expenses of his client. It is champertous in the extreme.

Mr. SIMS. The gentleman believes it is against public policy?

Mr. REAVIS. Yes.

Mr. SIMS. I agree with the gentleman in principle.

Mr. REAVIS. Yes; I believe it is against public policy, and I am not in favor of a man exacting more than 20 per cent on cases that will be reinstated or cases that will be brought in the future. I think 20 per cent is adequate.

Mr. SIMS. An amendment of that sort was placed on the last omnibus war-claims bill in the Senate, applying to the amounts appropriated under that act. Some suits have been brought to test the validity of that amendment—I do not know how many—and one has been decided by the court, while others are pending and will ultimately be taken on appeal to the Supreme Court, with this item inserted, that there is a vested right in the contract after the attorney has complied with the contract. I know that Congress is not bound by the same provision as the States are, but these cases are now pending, and no doubt they will be decided many a long day before the cases under this bill will be tried. But will not this provision prevent proceedings in small claims? In my section the claims are usually small, and the people are unwilling to pay a fee in advance, and would rather surrender a quarter or a third of the recovery or else let them go.

Mr. REAVIS. All they have to do is to come here and file their claim with Congress, and have it referred to the Court of Claims.

Mr. SIMS. They do not need a lawyer in the Court of Claims?

Mr. REAVIS. Very few of them need a lawyer; no one of them needs to have a lawyer unless there is involved a question of law requiring a lawyer. The gentleman states that the provision of the Senate that was attached to the omnibus war-claims bill has been the subject of litigation since. As I understand the determination of these cases that have been so far decided, the decision was not that the attorney had a vested right in the contract, but the determination was upon the proposition that when the Senate attached to that bill a provision which made void all contracts the court determined that that was violating the provisions of a contract already fully executed, and therefore was void. This amendment escapes that by making it apply to all contracts hereafter executed.

Mr. SIMS. Hereafter executed, not hereafter made?

Mr. REAVIS. Yes.

Mr. SIMS. I understand that under that decision, after the work was done, the right under the contract vested in the attorney could not be interfered with.

Mr. REAVIS. I suggest that there could be no contract up to to-day.

Mr. SHERLEY. Oh, Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman please, is that quite accurate? There might be a contract to perform service that was an enforceable contract. The fact that those services are performed after this legislation is enacted would not necessarily make invalid that contract by a provision such as the gentleman suggests.

Mr. REAVIS. That is doubtless true; but there could be no contract whereby an attorney or an agent contracted with a claimant that he would prosecute that case to judgment, because until the passage of this bill the claim could not pass into judgment.

Mr. SHERLEY. I do not think that quite follows, either. A man may have entered into a contract with a client that he will prosecute certain of these claims, which were then capable of being adjudicated by the Court of Claims. Congress takes some action which deprives the court of further jurisdiction. It then takes the action proposed here to-day, whereby the Court of Claims is again given jurisdiction of the subject matter.

Mr. MANN. A different subject matter.

Mr. REAVIS. The great difficulty is that the Court of Claims has never had jurisdiction to enter judgment in these cases.

Mr. SHERLEY. Oh, well, we are not necessarily dealing with that phase of it. The Court of Claims had jurisdiction to make certain findings.

Mr. REAVIS. Findings of fact.

Mr. SHERLEY. And a contract was entered into that we will assume was a valid contract at that time. Now, I doubt exceedingly whether by the provision that you are proposing here you can nullify that contract. I think you can affect future contracts, but the fact that the court lost its jurisdiction and gets it reestablished by this legislation does not necessarily interfere with the validity of a contract that at the time it was entered into was a valid contract.

Mr. REAVIS. As I view that, the cases that were pending before the Court of Claims prior to the passage of the Crawford amendment are no longer in existence.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SIMS. There is another matter which I wish to state, and I have yielded my time to other gentlemen.

Mr. MANN. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Tennessee have five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Unanimous consent is asked that the gentleman from Tennessee may proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SIMS. The object of this bill is simply to reinstate the claims which were dismissed by the Crawford amendment.

Mr. REAVIS. Yes.

Mr. SIMS. And to all intents and purposes to put them in the same condition as though the Crawford amendment had never passed. Now, is it not a very fine distinction to say that because judgment can now be rendered by the Court of Claims, the old contract providing for the payment of one-third, or whatever it may be, shall not apply? It may be good law, but it is mighty poor morals. Of course, if there was any misrepresentation or fraud in the obtaining of the contract, that is an entirely different matter.

Mr. REAVIS. Does the gentleman want me to answer that, or does he want me to listen to a speech?

Mr. SIMS. Suppose the gentleman had a claim against the Government for $500, and he should go to an attorney and say, "Now, if you will prosecute this claim, I will give you a contingent fee, one-third of the amount recovered, whatever it is." Does the gentleman think he should be permitted to take advantage of a law which was passed afterwards, which he never asked for or sought, and so avoid the payment of the fee after the work had been done and the contract carried out in good faith by the lawyer so employed?

Mr. REAVIS. In the first place the contingency has not happened that would make due the payment of the attorney's fee. If he had a cause of action against the claimant, it would not be one arising out of the contract. In my judgment he could not sue for the amount that would be due him under the contract, because the contract had never been completed; but could only prosecute an action upon the quantum meruit, for the value of the labor he actually performed. Now, these cases are no longer in existence. There never was a case in existence that the Court of Claims could enter judgment upon. The old cases are dismissed. They are off the docket. We are passing legislation that permits those cases to be put on the docket again, and to give to the Court of Claims jurisdiction to enter final judgment upon them, something that never existed before.

Mr. SIMS. And you hold that under those circumstances you now have the moral and legal right to say that even in those cases where the work has been performed the attorney shall not get more than 20 per cent.

Mr. REAVIS. I mean to say that if morality had the smallpox, the average Court of Claims lawyer has never been exposed. [Laughter.]

Mr. SIMS. That may be true. The gentleman may know more about that than I do.

Mr. HOUSTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. Certainly.

Mr. HOUSTON. I want to call attention to this fact, that there are a number of cases pending in the Court of Claims now, or that were pending until they were dismissed by virtue of the Crawford amendment and the action of the court after that amendment was passed. In these cases a great deal of the work has been performed by attorneys, in fact most of it in some cases. Now, the object and purpose of a part of the amendment that is offered by the gentleman is that all contracts hereafter made shall be limited to a 20 per cent fee, which I heartily favor and approve. But the same amendment imposes a penalty, and makes it a misdemeanor for any attorney to collect more than 20 per cent for services rendered, although they were rendered in pursuance of a contract heretofore made, the work having been done already. Now, if the holding of the court of the District of Columbia is sustained, you can not prevent these attorneys from getting their contractual fee. If that is so, it would not be right to undertake to do this by the imposition of a penalty, making it a misdemeanor to collect more than 20 per cent.

Mr. McKELLAR. If you were an attorney representing one of these claims that had been dismissed under the Crawford amendment, and if the claim is now reinstated, you would not be compelled to go on with your contract unless you desired to do so; and if your client comes in under this bill, and you are thereby given permission to proceed with the prosecution of the claim, would you not be obliged to take that permission subject to all the conditions that go with it?

Mr. HOUSTON. If I had made a contract, and had performed the services and completed my contract, and by virtue of the act of Congress and the holding of the court, jurisdiction of my case was lost, and then reinstated by an act of Congress, I certainly should feel that I stood in the same attitude in which I would have stood if there had been no such legislation by Congress and no such action by the court.

Mr. McKELLAR. You might feel that way, but would it change the legal status?

Mr. HOUSTON. The legal status would be identically the same. It would be restored to its former attitude, according to my opinion.

Mr. McKELLAR. I do not think so. I think the legal status would be just such as this bill would give you, and that is all.

Mr. HOUSTON. The point I want to make is this: If it is not within our power to enact a law which will prevent these men from getting their contractual rights, it is not right for us to pass a criminal statute—if that is possible, which I doubt—that would accomplish the same purpose.

Mr. SHERLEY. Manifestly, if we can not make a contract invalid we can not make a penalty for carrying out a valid contract.

Mr. HOUSTON. That is unquestionably true to my mind.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I find that the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, in the case of I. M. Moyers and Charles F. Consaul versus Thomas Fahey, in passing upon a clause in the omnibus bill passed by the last Congress limiting counsel fees to 20 per cent of the recovery, held that—

> A provision in such an act of appropriation, attempting to limit the compensation of counsel whose services were rendered in the Court of Claims under such a contract, and which statutory provision would have the effect of abrogating such contract in part, is in contravention of the fifth amendment to the Federal Constitution prohibiting deprivation of liberty or property without due process of law; and a plea of such enactment fails to state any legal ground of defense to an action by the attorney for recovery of the agreed fee.

Now, Mr. Chairman, while I earnestly approve that part of the proposed amendment providing that in contracts hereafter made counsel fees shall not be more than 20 per cent of the recovery, it seems to me that the attempt to limit the fee to 20 per cent where the parties had contracted for a larger fee by making the acceptance of more than 20 per cent a misdemeanor is an attempt to do something that is impossible. The decision of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia unquestionably bears out this view. I am always for the interests of the claimant and I would love to see them protected from unreasonable fees by laws sanctioned by the Constitution as construed by the courts of the country.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Chairman, I am quite in sympathy with the amendment offered by the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. REAVIS]. As has been stated in the House, there are no claims now pending before the Court of Claims. We are providing means whereby they can go into the Court of Claims; in other words, we are providing that claims may be reinstated, and we can provide the conditions upon which they may be reinstated. In my judgment, we can provide that no attorney who comes into the court petitioning for reinstatement of one of these cases shall receive more than a certain amount.

I am in sympathy with the bill, but I want the poor people who suffered the loss away back yonder to get it, and if I am going to vote for the bill I want them to be the real beneficiaries. I want it to be understood that I am not going to vote for it if three-quarters or 90 per cent of it is going to the attorneys before the Court of Claims. I favor the bill but I also favor the amendment and trust it will be adopted.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I should not bother the committee to say anything if it was not for the statement made by the gentleman from Oklahoma who has just taken his seat. Most of us will go as far as he in protecting the real claimants from the outrageous charges of attorneys. But some of us like to try to make our legislation effective. It is one thing to want to do something, and it is another thing to be able to do it. It is unfair to suggest that those of us who raise what is to say the least a close question as to the power to declare void a contract previously entered into are doing it in the interest of claim attorneys. For my part, I think the greatest abuse in connection with all the claims, both war and pension claims, grows out of the avarice of the attorneys who dig them up and have them frequently instituted in order that they may obtain exorbitant fees.

The question that is involved here seems to be somewhat confused in the minds of certain Members. There is a very marked difference between creating a forum and interfering with a contract. A contract has been entered into that we will assume is an enforcible contract—if it is not, we need not bother about it one way or the other—for a certain rate of compensation. Certain work is done in pursuance of the contract. There comes a condition whereby the court's jurisdiction is taken away from the subject matter of the contract. That is not voiding the contract, it simply for the time being prevents the further prosecution of the claim. Then the action of Congress serves to re-create in the court jurisdiction of the subject matter of the contract. It does not follow to my mind at all that because you are reestablishing the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims that you can reach back and say that a contract touching the recovery of certain moneys through the establishment of a claim shall not be enforced if it provides beyond a certain percentage of fees.

Mr. McKELLAR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. McKELLAR. If we can put conditions on the reinstatement of these cases, why can not we put another that is reasonable, a provision carrying out the general purposes of the act?

Mr. SHERLEY. Because I do not consider that the contract has ceased to be in existence, and if it was a valid contract in existence that we could not touch heretofore, I do not see how this act necessarily gives us power to invalidate it now.

Mr. McKELLAR. Will not the gentleman concede that when we passed the act taking away the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims that not only the contract ceased to exist but that the claim itself ceased to exist?

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman is failing to note the distinction between the existence of a forum with the right to adjudicate and the matter of the claim to be adjudicated. You may have a claim and have no forum for its adjudication.

Mr. LENROOT. Will the gentleman from Kentucky yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. I will.

Mr. LENROOT. I would like the gentleman's opinion as to whether or not the court has not jurisdiction to a certain extent over attorneys' fees relating to claims against the Government, and why Congress can not nullify a contract as being unconscionable?

Mr. SHERLEY. I did hold somewhat that view until the Court of Claims took a different view. I am not so certain about it now.

Mr. ALMON. Mr. Chairman, one of the purposes of this bill is to repeal section 5 of what is commonly known as the omnibus war claims bill, approved March 4, 1915, known as the Crawford amendment, and to reinstate on the docket of the Court of Claims those claims dismissed after the adoption of the Crawford amendment.

This amendment prohibited further consideration by the Court of Claims of claims for property taken or destroyed by the Federal Army during the Civil War.

Another purpose is to relieve Congress from the adjudication of private claims against the Government by having the Court of Claims to try the case and enter final judgment.

I believe that it is generally conceded that the Crawford amendment should be repealed, and that the practice in vogue heretofore relative to the method Congress has adopted in having claims passed upon for property taken or destroyed during the Civil War is not desirable and results have been unsatisfactory in many ways. It has, no doubt, resulted in the payment of some claims which should not have been paid, and the failure to pay many just and meritorious claims which should have been paid. I hope that this bill will be so amended before it is finally passed by Congress that every claimant who has a just and honest claim against the Government will be furnished a means by which he will be given an opportunity to establish and have adjudicated his claim on its merits. Many of my constituents have just and honest claims against the Government for property taken during the Civil War. The fact that their claims are half a century old is no reason why the Government should not pay them, if they are just claims and can be established by legal proof.

It is an undoubted fact that the people of the South never have received at the hands of this Government that fair treatment which they should have received since the Civil War in the matter of consideration of their claims for property taken for use of the Federal Government.

The case of Grant, in the first Court of Claims report, shows that court entertained war claims during the war; but that was stopped by act of Congress taking away the jurisdiction of the court to hear such claims. Then came a period of some years when no door was open to such claims. The Southern Claims Commission was established by act of March 3, 1871, and, as shown by reports of the War Claims Committee in recent years, that commission was of little benefit, and proceedings before it were largely a farce, because evidence submitted in ordinary legal manner was liable to be overturned and offset by ex parte reports of special agents or detectives employed by the commission. The jurisdiction of that commission was very narrow also, so that many claims did not come within its jurisdiction at all.

Then came the Bowman Act of March 3, 1883, which practically had the effect of permitting those whose claims had been tried by the Southern Claims Commission and had been rejected or which had been rejected by the War Department to have their claims referred to the Court of Claims for mere findings of fact. That jurisdiction was an improvement on the claim commission, because at least the procedure was in accordance with court forms. Many claims could not be considered under that act, so the Tucker Act of March 3, 1887, was passed, which gave more relief. Under those acts, however, the Court of Claims could not enter judgments, and, even if favorable findings were made, claimants and their lawyers never knew whether the claims would ever be paid or when, and recently the war-claims act of March 4, 1915, was the first appropriation act for payment of such claims during a period of more than 10 years.

Section 151 of the Judicial Code, approved March 3, 1911, repealed the Bowman and Tucker Acts and became a substitute for them, but still gave the Court of Claims power to make findings of fact only in these war claims.

In so far as this pending bill now under discussion gives the Court of Claims power to enter absolute judgments, I am most heartily in favor of its passage. It is something that should have been enacted years ago, so that claims would be either finally won in the court, and be thereafter promptly paid by Congress, on estimates made each session by the Treasury Department; or, if lost, the claims would be finally disposed of by the court.

I have been much interested, however, in the bill introduced by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS], to which he has referred in his comments on the pending bill. I believe his bill is a far better bill than the one now under discussion, and I regret very much that it was not reported out by the committee in the place of the present one.

Mr. Chairman, I have the honor of representing in this body the district in Alabama formerly represented by that distinguished and gallant soldier, Gen. Joe Wheeler, whose fame as a warrior was attained during the War between the States. He served many years in this body, and only left this floor to accept a commission from the hands of President McKinley as a general in the Army of the United States in the War with Spain. This former general of the Confederacy, Mr. Chairman, took his place in the Army of the reunited country alongside that distinguished son of the Old Dominion State, Fitzhugh Lee, and it has seemed to me that nothing could more clearly typify the absolute wiping out of former sectional lines in this country—nothing could more plainly mark the passing of the day when the North of this country could be distinguished from the South than the presence in our Army of these two former warriors of the Confederacy.

I had supposed that the time had arrived when the Representatives of the whole American people gathered together in this body would welcome anything that would tend to bury, and bury deeply, the last vestiges of discrimination on the statute books between those who happened to reside in the South during the Civil War from those who happened to live in the North.

At the instance of that revered and beloved former Senator from Alabama, Joseph F. Johnston, now gone to his last rest, legislation was had only two or three years ago that removed from the books the statute which prevented collection of claims for back pay due prior to 1861 by former officers of the United States Army who later had resigned and entered the Confederate Army.

The consideration of that measure in the other body of Congress was marked by a very beautiful and patriotic speech, delivered by the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE].

Yet, when we now come to provide for consideration of the claims of the people of the South for compensation for property taken for use of the Federal Army, we are confronted by an apparent demand that the former conditions laid upon collection of recovery be again imposed, in all their rigor of reconstruction days.

Mr. Chairman, it would be useless for me to contend that a man who served in the Confederate Army as a soldier should be paid by the United States for supplies consumed by the Federal Army during the Civil War, but I do submit that the thought of the gentleman from Tennessee, in his bill, is the correct one on this point, and that is that if the owner of the supplies did not bear arms against the General Government; if he did not serve the Confederacy or local governments in any manner; if he did not vote for secession; and if he gave no aid to the credit of the Confederacy, by exchanging his property or money for its securities, then that person or his heirs ought to be paid for his private property taken for public use.

Old men and old ladies, who had no more to do with the bringing about of the secession of the Southern States than unborn babes, and who had no more to do with the waging of the war than babes, had property taken from them. Yet, under the terms of this pending bill, neither they nor their heirs or representatives can secure compensation for Army supplies unless they can establish an affirmative loyalty to the Union. The same statement also applies to the cases of young ladies, minors, who had absolutely nothing to do with the war, but who obviously could not prove any affirmative loyalty to the Federal Government or to any government, because they had no occasion to do anything, one way or the other.

Mr. Chairman, I submit that this requirement should be made more reasonable and fair, and that the suggestion contained in the bill of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] should be adopted and made a part of this measure. If not included in it by the action of this House, then I earnestly hope that another body may see fit to take a broader and fairer view of the matter—one more consistent with the present spirit of our country and of our age—and will amend this bill along the line suggested.

Now a few words only as to one or two other phases of the subject suggested by discussion here. Some gentlemen have expressed a very deep solicitude lest these claims have been bought up by so-called claim agents, who will profit largely by this enactment.

That idea has been pretty effectively exploded here, I think, but I will call attention again to the fact that section 3477 of the Revised Statutes makes illegal any assignment or attempted assignment of a claim against the United States until after the claim has been allowed and after the warrant for its payment has been actually issued. In short, a claim can not be sold or assigned, and I do not suppose any person would be so foolish as to attempt to buy an assignment of a claim in the face of this statutory prohibition. If so, he will find that he has bought nothing.

Then it has also been suggested that proof of these claims is a mere formality; that one claim is just like others of its class, and so forth. While as a practicing lawyer I never happened to represent any of these claims, and probably would have declined employment in any event, in such an uncertain matter, yet my general information is sufficient to cause me to say that the idea mentioned is erroneous. Save for the fact that the main issues are the same in most of these cases, the actual proof of every case is necessarily peculiar to that particular case. The cases do not resemble one another any more than do jury cases that are tried before the ordinary civil courts. The facts of every case are different from those in other cases.

I know that some claimants have had as their local counsel in my own district members of the legal profession who stand at the head of the bar. Witnesses are examined and cross-examined. Attorneys representing the United States act for the Government at every stage of the proceedings. These facts are all set forth in clear terms by the report of the War Claims Committee on the last war claims omnibus bill of last Congress. These claims are not like pension claims, which can be proven up by use of blanks which merely have to be filled in. They are, in effect, separate suits, and have to be conducted by counsel in the same manner as ordinary suits, with the same incidental questions of evidence, of law governing title, descents, distributions, and so forth, as ordinary suits.

These Civil War claims have also been criticized here because of their age. It is true that they ought to have been paid years ago. But whose fault is it that they were not considered and paid long ago? Is it not the fault of Congress itself?

During the war Congress took away the right to present such claims to the Court of Claims. The claimants were not responsible for that action, obviously. From 1864 down to the present time, Mr. Chairman, these claimants have never had a legal remedy or a way opened to them for presenting and prosecuting one of these claims. All they could do was to exercise the constitutional right of petition to Congress. That right might or might not be productive of any results. We all know how nearly impossible it is to secure the attention of Congress to private matters, and it is my information, gathered mostly from official reports, that for many years it was almost impossible to secure the right from Congress to go into the Court of Claims with one of these claims.

So far as this bill now under consideration gives to the Court of Claims the right to enter judgment on good claims it is certainly a step in the right direction. It should be amended in the matter of proof of loyalty, as has been suggested by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS]. It should also give the right to petition the court directly, and without requiring the claimants to first secure permission of Congress.

Mr. Chairman, while I do not approve this bill in all respects by any means, while I think we should amend it very materially in several regards, yet I shall vote for it, even though I deem it unsatisfactory, because it appears to be the best that we can secure at the present time. Its enactment may give relief to some of my constituents that I know have just claims, some of whom have already adduced evidence in support of their claims before the Court of Claims. However, I still trust that before it becomes a law it may be so amended as to approach nearer to the securing of full and substantial justice than it can do in its present form.

Among the nations of the earth the United States has a reputation for fair dealing that is enviable. As the result of the Boxer uprising in China we secured and had in our hands a fund of several million dollars to cover compensation to our citizens for damages then suffered by them in China. We scrutinized all those claims most carefully in the Court of Claims and then turned back to China all the residue of the fund after satisfaction of the judicially ascertained claims against the fund. In short, we followed the golden rule in so doing.

In our treatment of claims of our own citizens, however, we can find no very great source of pride. Let us hope that with the enactment of this bill in some form we may be starting our Government upon a path that will lead ultimately to the doing of exact justice to all who may have proper claims against the Government, so that right may be done to all.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I agree with the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. REAVIS] when he states that the recovery for services rendered under this bill would be rather in the nature of a quantum meruit than under some former contract. The contract which was made previously applied to conditions as they existed at that time. The contract did not take into consideration and was not made in view of the fact that Congress would subsequently pass some legislation which would aid the attorney in the prosecution of these claims.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. McKELLAR. Is not the situation just this? Here is an attorney who has represented a claimant whose claim has been thrown out of the Court of Claims by an act of Congress. The attorney has a dormant interest in that claim, and the client has a dormant interest in it. If Congress puts jurisdiction back in the Court of Claims, can it not also impose conditions upon both the attorney and the claimant?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I was about to come to that point a little later, but I wish to further emphasize that which I just stated, that the contract being made as applied to certain former conditions, when Congress creates altogether different conditions it has no application to those conditions which have just been created. As the gentleman said, it would be a strange doctrine indeed if Congress was not permitted when it passed a statute providing for the payment of certain money to certain claimants to determine also how and in what manner that money should be paid. If that is not the case it is new doctrine to me.

Mr. REAVIS. Does the gentleman understand that by the legislation that is now before the House we are legislating for the benefit of the claimant or the lawyer?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. We are legislating for the benefit of the claimant, as the gentleman has already shown. I think the gentleman's amendment ought to pass.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota rose.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto close.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I have not yet yielded the floor. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. Is it not true that the subject matter of the contract entered into by the attorney is the same now as it was before the action of Congress?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The subject matter is the same, but that does not determine the validity of the contract or its application.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. The act of Congress simply determines the method of collecting or not collecting this claim.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The act of Congress simply puts validity into a claim that now has none, and the contract was made when there was no validity in it.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. I am just as sincere in wanting to see the claimant protected here as the gentleman from Iowa, but I am sure that if this amendment is adopted it will be of no use or service except as to future contracts.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in three minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, in the city of New York we recently had a decision in a case somewhat analogous, the case of Levine against the Metropolitan Street Railway Co., where some 15 years after the case had been finally disposed of in our highest court, because of gross fraud in the manner of its disposition, it was reopened, and all contracts arising in connection with the case were held to adhere to the original case. It seems to me that unless we had arranged in some other way that contracts made originally in connection with these claims will continue with the claims when we revive them by this legislation. The gentleman from Kentucky says, in opposition to the views of the gentleman from Iowa, that he also held those views, but there had been a decision of the court the other way, and it seems to me if that is so, while we may have our opinion as to the decision of the Court of Claims, nevertheless that is the law.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend the amendment. After the word "that," insert the word "hereafter."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the amendment by inserting after the word "that," in the first line, the word "hereafter."

Mr. HOUSTON. Let us have it read as amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 7. That hereafter it shall be unlawful, etc.

Mr. MANN. I thought that amendment had been agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Nebraska.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill to the House with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. LLOYD, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 6918 and had directed him to report the same back with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them in gross.

The question was taken, and the amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina, the motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

By unanimous consent, Mr. BORLAND was granted leave to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, the papers in the case of John H. Shaw, Sixty-third Congress, no adverse report having been made thereon.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. PARK. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Georgia rise?

Mr. PARK. Mr. Speaker, I rise to ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the subject of rural credits.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the subject of rural credits. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Connecticut rise?

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a like request and to submit as a part of my remarks an official letter written by the War Department to me on the question of the establishment by private capital of high-explosive plants in the United States.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] asks leave to extend his remarks in the RECORD and to include the document mentioned.

Mr. HILL. I desire, Mr. Speaker, to include both the letter which I wrote to the department and the one I received from them.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's letter and the reply from the department. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

CAPTURED AND ABANDONED PROPERTY.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill H. R. 8246.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina calls up the bill the title of which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 8246) to revive the right of action under the act of March 12, 1863 (12 Stat. L., p. 820).

The SPEAKER. The House automatically resolves itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 8246, and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LLOYD] will take the chair.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 8246, with Mr. LLOYD in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the union for the consideration of the bill the title of which the Clerk will report,

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 8246) to revive the right of action under the act of March 12, 1863 (12 Stat. L., p. 820).

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, the bill which has just passed the House provided that all claimants having claims growing out of the use and occupation of property or for stores and supplies taken would have the right to have their claims referred to the Court of Claims for investigation and final adjudication. There is another class of cases growing out of the war which are not included under the provisions of the bill introduced by the gentleman from Illinois, but which arise under what is known as the captured and abandoned property act. On March 12, 1863, this act was passed by Congress, providing for the seizure and sale of property abandoned in what was then called the insurrectionary district. The act provided that the cotton—for it was generally cotton—should be sold and the net proceeds placed in the Treasury to the credit of the owner of the cotton. Claimants were given two years after the close of the war in which to file claims for the recovery of their money. The act provided, as this act provides here, that only loyal persons could recover. Many claims were filed under the right given them by this act of Congress, but because of the condition that prevailed many claimants did not file their claims or attempt to recover amounts which were to their credit in the Treasury. The Supreme Court decided in 1869 that officially the war ended August 20, 1866. Claimants had, therefore, until August 20, 1868, in which to file their claims, but this decision of the Supreme Court was not filed until December 18, 1869. Most of the claimants believed that the time for the filing of claims had expired long before 1868, and therefore did not file their claims. Consequently, when the Supreme Court filed its decision that the war did not end until August 20, 1866, they were unable to avail themselves of the right that the Supreme Court thought it was giving them. Since that time many private acts have been passed by Congress giving the claimants the right to go to the Court of Claims and prove their cases under this captured and abandoned property act.

In the report I have filed with this bill there is set forth the amount of money that has been paid under this captured and abandoned property act. According to a circular of the Treasury Department issued in 1900 the amount of this fund that remained at that date was $4,992,349.92, and that same circular called attention to the fact that in a great number of cases it was ascertained from the records in the Treasury that were taken at the close of the war from the Confederate Government that the greater part of this cotton seized under the captured and abandoned property act, and which has not been paid for, was cotton that had been sold to the Confederate States, and that therefore the alleged claimants had no title to that property. The amount that the records show as the property of the Confederate States is so nearly the amount that remains of this captured and abandoned property act that the Treasury circular contained this statement:

It will be noticed that the amount received from the sale of the Confederate cotton about equals the amount of the proceeds of captured and abandoned cotton which remained after the payment of judgment—

And so forth.

And it is therefore estimated by the committee that the amount that would be affected by the passage of this bill could not possibly exceed $500,000. I believe from the investigations we have made that that is a most liberal estimate.

Mr. STAFFORD. I notice in reading the report that the gentleman estimates the amount that can possibly be recovered, if this bill is passed, to be $500,000, but there is no mention in the report of what that estimate is based upon. I would like to inquire upon what he predicates the estimate?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I was just telling the basis. The balance of this fund was $4,992,349.92, and the Treasury statement in 1900 says that the records of the Confederacy which they have in their possession show that the cotton to the amount of about $4,400,000 that was captured and the proceeds of which are in the Treasury had been sold to the Confederate States, and, that being so, there is but $500,000 of that fund to which claimants could prove title. If the title was in the Confederate government and not in claimants they of course could not recover.

Mr. STAFFORD. Well, how general are these claims? It seems to me, if the gentleman will permit, very strange that a law, passed back in 1867, was it?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. In 1863, originally.

Mr. STAFFORD. And then revived.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Since that time some private claims have been passed, as I have stated just now.

Mr. STAFFORD. And for nearly 50 years no legislative action has been taken on this character of claims except by special bills?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Yes, sir.

Mr. STAFFORD. And now 50 years afterwards you attempt to open the matter again and grant the same claimants the right to present these claims in the Court of Claims. What is the purpose of renewing this at this late day?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I will answer the gentleman. Ever since I have been on this War Claims Committee I do not know of any man who has gotten a claim under it——

Mr. STAFFORD. What is the spur back of it? There must be some spur back of it to revive all of this ancient matter.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. If the gentleman will let me answer him, I will do so. I believe that of the claims growing out of the war the class of cases affected by this bill have more justice in them than any others, for this reason: The Supreme Court decided in the Padelford case, in the Klein case, and in other cases that this was a trust fund; that the cotton was sold and that it was never intended to divest the owner of the title to his cotton; that the Government provided the net proceeds should be turned into the Treasury and the claimants should have the right for two years after the close of the war to come in and prove title to their property. The court decided, I say, several times that it was a trust fund. Now, the statute of limitations runs against it. Several times since that committees of this House and of the Senate have reported bills similar to this—six times in this House—and they have died upon the calendar. They were never acted upon. One member of the Committee suggests to me that away back in the Forty-ninth Congress they were presented and favorably reported, and down to this day they have been favorably reported. Now, if there ever was a class of cases where a man was entitled to his claim it is when you tell him his money was taken, that it was not used to carry on the war but was placed in the Treasury to his credit. If he was given two years after the close of the war, and because of the condition of things then prevailing in this country he failed to file his claim, and now the statute of limitations runs against what the Supreme Court has declared to be a trust fund, he should not be denied the right to come in and prove his case; and if the court shall find for him, he will get nothing but what is his own; and if the court does not find for him, the Government is not hurt.

Mr. STAFFORD. Has the gentleman advanced any reason why the claimants were prevented from filing their claims within the period originally authorized to present them?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. When did the war close? That question is debated to-day. It has been debated in Congress for years. Many of these claimants, I have no doubt, believed that it ended in April, 1865, with the surrender of Lee. We know now that even with the facilities for transportation and transmission of intelligence, improved as they are, that there are some men in this country who do not read the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and do not know of the acts passed by Congress. It can be assumed——

Mr. STAFFORD. Those who have claims against the Government are too rapidly informed by claim agents, whose sole business is in ferreting out claims against the Government and in searching for unknown claimants.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I agree with the gentleman, and I have no more affection for them than he has.

Mr. STAFFORD. What assurance have we that a large part of this will not go to the claim agents?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. If the gentleman will offer a similar amendment to that which was offered to the other bill, I will support it——

Mr. STAFFORD. It will prevent these claims from going into the hands of the claim agents, who are the originators and instigators of a lot of this legislation.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I agree with you, although they are not the originators of this particular legislation.

Mr. MAPES. Will the gentleman explain what steps have been taken to preserve the proof of the claims of these claimants?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I will tell the gentleman why these claims appeal to me more than any other claims.

When a man brings a claim under this bill, if the records of the Treasury Department do not show that it was his property, he can not recover. If the records do show that his property was taken from him and the proceeds placed in the Treasury, I think you will agree with me that he ought to have his chance.

Mr. MAPES. Is the proof required confined to the books of the Treasury entirely?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. That is the final proof, and the only proof that will be conclusive. That is the conclusive proof. This is simply a revival of the original act, in the exact language of that act which was passed at the close of the Civil War, and it gives claimants no greater right now than Congress then gave them.

Mr. MAPES. It would be difficult, would it not, to prove an ordinary claim 50 years afterwards?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. The Government is represented by the Department of Justice, and the claimant has to prove, as the gentleman will notice by reading the language of the bill, that the property was taken from him, and if the attorney acting for the Department of Justice produces the records of the Treasury Department and proves that the property was not taken from him, of course that is the end of it.

Mr. MAPES. Would it not be difficult for the Government to prove that the property was not taken by the Government, and ought not the claimant to be required to show from the records of the Treasury Department that the property was taken?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Well, I have no objection to that. I know that the Court of Claims certainly will not hold otherwise, when this bill provides that he shall, to the satisfaction of the Court of Claims, prove "his ownership of said property and his right to the proceeds thereof." The Court of Claims, in construing this very act years ago, required that that proof be made, and this is merely a revival of the act passed at the close of the war. Under that act it was necessary to prove that the proceeds were turned into the Treasury, and certainly the decision of the court in those cases would govern now; and if the Department of Justice, on calling for the records of the Treasury Department, should prove that you did not have any money turned into the Treasury the Court of Claims would not find for you.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from South Carolina yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I yield.

Mr. LENROOT. There is no trouble about the identity of present claimant? That will be wholly a matter of oral proof?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Yes; it would have to be.

Mr. LENROOT. The act also requires that the original claimant shall prove that he did not give aid or comfort to the rebellion. That is in the words of the original act?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Yes.

Mr. LENROOT. What possible opportunity could the Government have to meet any contention in that direction that is made 50 years after the events transpired?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I will say to the gentleman from Wisconsin that it would have the same opportunity that the claimant would have, the proponent; the same opportunity that he would have under the bill just passed, or under any other bill, and the burden is on him.

I will go further and say, however—because otherwise I would not be dealing frankly with the gentleman, and I always love to be—the bill provides that he shall be loyal. But the Supreme Court decided in the case of Klein that this was a trust fund, and that the Government never intended to divest the owner of the title to his property, and that a man was entitled to recover where he was pardoned, took the oath of allegiance, and lived up to it.

In the year 1863 the Congress gave to the President of the United States the right to pardon a man, attaching to that pardon any condition that he might deem wise. Of course the Executive had that power anyway, as was decided afterwards by the Supreme Court, but if any legislative authority was needed it was given to him. The President did exercise that pardoning power and restored property rights, and under the terms of this bill, under this very act, at that time, in the case of Klein, a claim was made where proof of loyalty was not required, because the Supreme Court held that the President of the United States at that time had pardoned the man and demanded as a condition to that pardon that he take the oath of allegiance, and that inasmuch as he did it his rights of property were restored to him. That being the condition, it was unfair to say, after he had given that oath of allegiance in return for amnesty, that he could not recover the proceeds of the sale of the property so taken from him.

Mr. LENROOT. Notwithstanding that, this bill does make necessary the proof of loyalty.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I simply submit to this House whether it ought not to do for these people now what this Congress did at the close of the war, when there was far greater feeling arising out of the war than there is now.

Mr. LENROOT. And at that time the Government had opportunity to ascertain the facts regarding the loyalty of any claimant, but now it must be a prima facie showing on an ex parte case, and the Government can not meet any contention made by the claimant, provided a prima facie case is made.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. What the gentleman says may be so as to claims for stores and supplies, and it may be so as to claims for use and occupation of property; but here the absolute and conclusive proof is in the books of the Government itself, and when the books show, for instance, that you had property taken and the proceeds were placed in the United States Treasury, that fact is beyond dispute, and the only fact you have in mind is proof as to loyalty. Proof as to loyalty is demanded in the bill just passed.

I do not believe that it is impossible for the Government to prove the disloyalty of a man. Take that part of the country that I come from. Suppose some man came here and claimed he was loyal. He would have a much harder time in securing proof to convince anybody that he was loyal to the Government at that time than you would have to secure proof that he was disloyal, because he is known and a hundred witnesses could be procured. The Government takes testimony in such cases. When a witness is presented he is cross-examined. When any man comes from any town in this country, do you mean to tell me that the Department of Justice, with the superior agencies in its control, can not go into that town and find witnesses who would testify that he was not loyal?

I believe that in this class of cases that is the only question in controversy. The rest of the question must be settled by the books in the Treasury. Cases of this kind are unlike cases with respect to claims for stores and supplies and property taken, which must be supported by oral testimony.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Is there anything in the law or this bill proposed as an amendment which would prevent a claim that has once been considered and passed upon adversely by Congress being again considered by a committee and referred to the Court of Claims?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. This bill provides that within two years the claims must be filed. It does not prohibit the filing of a claim or the consideration by Congress of a claim which some years ago was presented to Congress and was not acted upon. As I stated to the gentleman just now, bills similar to this one have been reported six times in the House. Changes of administration have not affected them, but the justice of their cause has appealed to the committee, regardless of party, and the committees that have investigated the subject have reported these bills to Congress. If a man had a bill presented at that time or at any time in the past and Congress did not pass it, he would have the right to have it sent to the Court of Claims.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. The gentleman does not quite answer my question. Suppose a bill was presented to the committee and considered and reported to the House, and the House acted upon it and rejected it. I do not talk about probabilities now; but is it possible for that bill to be presented again to the committee and then referred to the Court of Claims for its consideration?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. There is nothing in this bill to prohibit it.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. I have in mind bills that were presented here and considered at length, and the action of the House was unfavorable. Is it possible that this bill is so framed that those bills can again be presented to the committee, and be referred by the committee or by action of Congress to the Court of Claims for consideration?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. This bill does not make any prohibition of such action, and under the gentleman's statement I would say yes, that if the committee decided to send it to the Court of Claims, it would go there. I have no knowledge of the bills that the gentleman refers to, or what condition prevailed. I presume they must have been bills presented to Congress, asking for a direct appropriation; and if they were not passed it was for the reason that this committee has followed the policy of refusing to pay claims unless they have been passed upon by the court.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. But where all the facts were presented to Congress, and the entire matter was fully considered and passed upon and the claim was rejected, and Congress with full knowledge of the circumstances rejected the claim, is there any way under this bill, if it passes, by which it would be possible for that claimant again to present his claim and have it go directly to the Court of Claims for consideration? Should not this bill contain some provision barring those whose claims have once been passed upon by this Congress?

Mr. RAGSDALE. Will the gentleman permit an interruption for a moment?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. In a moment. I will say to the gentleman from Michigan candidly that I do not think the bill should contain such a prohibition, for this reason: I have knowledge of such claims being presented to the Committee on Claims. As a member of the committee I have always been opposed to paying claims that have not been passed upon by the court, because we have consistently followed the policy of referring these cases to the Court of Claims, where they could receive more careful consideration than the Congress or the Committee on Claims could possibly give to them. Now, if a man presented such a claim to the committee during the last three Congresses, I know I have not voted in favor of them, nor has any member of the committee. A different policy prevailed. We did not believe Congress ought to act on those cases, because we did not have the facts at hand to enable us to tell whether the claim should be paid or not.

If such a bill was presented to the House Congress undoubtedly acted just as the War Claims Committee did and rejected it. Many Members of the House would have been actuated by the same idea that prevails in the committee to-day, that Congress should not pass a claim when the Court of Claims has not considered it. Now, we should not preclude that man from going down to the Court of Claims and having his case tried on its merits, because at the best he can only get the money that the Treasury has set aside to his credit, and at the worst the Government will not lose anything.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. The gentleman from South Carolina is a member of that committee and is much more familiar with what the committee has done and the course it is pursuing now and is more familiar with the course pursued by the Court of Claims than I am, but I have understood that when these claims were presented to the Court of Claims that the court simply determined the state of facts and did not enter judgment on the merits of the case but reported to Congress the finding of facts.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. That is true.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. In case the bill is presented and the committee has sent it to the Court of Claims and that court has made a finding of facts, reporting it back to Congress, and Congress has acted upon it and rejected the claim, is there any way by which that claim can again, through the committee or otherwise, reach the Court of Claims?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. There is nothing in this act to prohibit it.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Does not the gentleman think there ought to be something to prohibit it?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. If the gentleman from South Carolina will permit me——

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I yield to the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I do not believe that Congress has the power to pass any kind of a law that would prevent a future Congress considering any claim, no matter how many times it has been considered here. If we did pass that sort of a law, then a subsequent Congress would have a right to do as it pleased.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. These claims are different; they are old and stale. This discussion has brought out the fact, as it has many times before, that the claims are stale, and it seems to me there is good reason for dealing with claims of this kind in a different way than with ordinary claims brought before Congress. After a measure has passed through all the proceedings that I have outlined, been considered by a committee of this House, sent to the Court of Claims where there has been a finding of facts, reported back to Congress, discussed on the floor and adversely acted upon, that action ought to be final as to these stale claims, it seems to me.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. How can the gentleman consider these as stale claims when they have been knocking at the door of Congress ever since the Forty-ninth Congress? Committee after committee has brought in bills to the same effect, and they have been passed by Congress, but delayed Congress after Congress and not passed now, and those ought not to be denounced as stale cases.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. The gentleman is referring to this particular measure as not being stale, but claims that will be presented for consideration by claimants asking payment for money out of the Treasury; those claims are stale because no damage has been inflicted for 50 years.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. The French spoliation claims are still with us and will be for 50 years to come.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Does the gentleman put these claims on the same footing and in the same class as the French spoliation claims?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I do not, but I say that you can not get rid of any stale claims being presented to a subsequent Congress.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. I am not complaining because the claims are stale, I am complaining because if this act is passed claims once before Congress and once before the Court of Claims, once adversely acted upon by Congress, can be brought up and considered again.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. And there is no amount of law which will make it impossible.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. There ought to be a law that will make it impossible.

My BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I have no idea that it would be a very dangerous proposition to reenact this law for the reason the gentleman from Michigan suggests. I agree that if the Court of Claims found in any case the records in the Treasury Department did not show that the man was entitled to property——

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. The Court of Claims does not report that the claimant is entitled to anything; it simply reports the state of facts.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. If they reported the State of facts showing that the claimant did not own the property, the claimant would have no standing, and the bill is not intended to help him. Under this bill the records of the Treasury Department would be conclusive evidence, and if a man had a claim and the Court of Claims considered it and reported that the records did not show that the property was taken from him and Congress acted on that, if he has so little sense as to go again and petition the Court of Claims asking for consideration, and if they found again that the records of the Treasury Department did not show that the property was taken, the court has power to render judgment, and we must presume that the court would render the same judgment that it did before, and dismiss the case.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Heretofore they simply reported facts and returned the facts to Congress, and then Congress passed on the merits of the claim, saying whether or not under that state of facts the claimant is entitled to recover the money from the Government. All the statements of the gentleman to the effect that the Court of Claims determines so-and-so is not correct; it determines nothing as to the merits of a claim, and never has.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. It determines the facts.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. But it never had anything to do with the merits of the claim.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. The gentleman and I do not differ very much on it. His idea is that because the claim has been acted upon by Congress the claimant should not have the right to present his case in the Court of Claims. The reason I do not assent to it is this——

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. If the gentleman agrees with me, why does he not assent to it and permit the bill to be amended?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. If the gentleman will wait a minute, I will tell him. If the Court of Claims had reported in its findings of fact that the records of the Treasury showed that property had not been taken from a particular claimant, I do not think he ought to have another day in court; but I can conceive it possible that the Court of Claims may have reported in some case that property had been taken from a man and the proceeds placed to his credit in the Treasury; that that claim had been sent up here to Congress and that Congress had failed to act upon it, or that when it did act upon it it came to the conclusion that because the claim had not been filed within the time provided by law the bill should not be passed. If that were true, I do not think this man ought to be denied the right at this time to come into that court and present his case for trial.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. When a matter is presented to Congress and it has been favorably acted upon, there is no record made of the reasons or the arguments that actuated or moved the Members of Congress in voting on the measure.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. No.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. When a bill is presented and defeated it is presumed that it was not a meritorious measure. When a matter comes from the Court of Claims and a bill is presented to Congress with the idea that the state of facts determined by the Court of Claims justifies the claimant in asking Congress to pay him money, and Congress considers all statements of fact from the Court of Claims, hears the arguments and the reports of the committee and acts adversely, that ought to settle it. It seems to me that in this class of cases there ought to be a bar to further presentation of the claim. I have in mind a case in the last Congress, presented, I think, by one the Members from the State of Tennessee, favorably reported upon by the Committee on War Claims, and the Court of Claims had made a report that property of the officer in question, of the Confederate Army, had been taken and had been sold and the proceeds of the sale covered into the Treasury of the United States, and was there at the time of considering the bill. Based upon that, a bill in behalf of the claimant was presented to the House and the House spent considerable time in considering it and acted unfavorably upon it. I have that one case in mind, and I think it will be altogether wrong for the law to permit that claim ever to be presented again, and if we now permit another presentation of claims when we are trying to fix the matter up so as finally to get rid of claims of that kind and do some measure of justice—full justice, if you please—there ought to be a provision in the bill preventing the presentation of claims of that kind.

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Not now. The gentleman's position I understand thoroughly; but I answer him in this way: This bill is in line with the bill which we have just passed, to rid the Congress of the consideration of these claims. If this bill is passed, any man who thinks that he has a claim under the captured and abandoned property act has a right to come into the court and present his claim, and if, under the law passed at the close of the war he has a just claim and the records of the department show his property was taken from him and his money placed to his credit in the Treasury, he will be given judgment, and he ought to have judgment for it.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. It would depend upon the circumstances under which the property was taken. In one case I might favor prompt payment to the former owner; in another case I might be altogether opposed to payment.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. If he comes within this law, the law of Congress, he is entitled to it, and if he does not come within it, that court has no power to give him judgment.

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman now yield?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Yes.

Mr. CARLIN. As I understand the suggestion, the suggestion of my friend, it is based upon the idea that the claims which have already been refused by the action of Congress might be considered under this bill.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Yes.

Mr. CARLIN. Is not the answer to that this: That the court would find itself bound by the action of Congress under the general rule that where there has been legislative construction of the matter itself the court will carry out that legislative construction? I think you would find, therefore, that this bugaboo would amount to nothing, because the court would feel itself bound by the legislative construction.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Yes; under the laws and statutes as they were at the time, but here is a new statute which practically confers new rights upon claimants, imposes new duties, confers new powers, additional powers upon the Court of Claims, and it seems to me what the gentleman from Virginia says would not obtain in case this bill should pass without the amendment I suggest.

Mr. BENNET. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. BENNET. There is a lady living in Long Island City, N. Y., whose father during the late Civil War kept a jewelry store in New Orleans, and after Gen. Butler occupied that city they took the jewelry out of their store and sold it. That gentleman was a very noted adherent of the Confederacy, he had equipped a regiment or two at his own expense. Now, under this bill would it be possible for that lady to go to the court, under the captured and abandoned property act, and secure a judgment for the value of that jewelry taken out of that store in New Orleans in 1862 or 1863?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. If the gentleman whose jewelry was taken from him under the captured and abandoned property act, could prove that it was sold and trace it into the Treasury and show that its net proceeds were placed to his credit under this act, he could; otherwise he could not, because the courts have held in the construction of this very act that he must prove that the net proceeds of his property were turned into the Treasury and placed to his credit.

Mr. BENNET. And notwithstanding the gentleman's very notorious disloyalty?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I will say to the gentleman no answer can be better than that of the Supreme Court of the United States to that. I said just now that the court held in its decision under the captured and abandoned property act that a man who was disloyal would be entitled to recover, because it has been held time and again that when they took the oath of allegiance their property rights were restored; for when President Lincoln said, "If you take the oath of allegiance your property rights will be restored," and they took the oath and were loyal thereafter, good faith demanded that the Government live up to the pledge of the President that their property rights were restored. Last week we paid a deserving tribute to Lincoln. I voted for the completion of the Lincoln Memorial, as did Members from my State and many from my section; but if Lincoln could be here he would say to the gentlemen, I think, that greater than any memorial monument erected to him along Potomac Park would be your action in redeeming his pledge made to those people that if they took the oath of allegiance their property rights would be restored. [Applause.]

Mr. BENNET. I am not saying at all I disagree, but I am simply wanting to get the purpose of the act. And now I desire to follow that up by another question.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I will say this, that the best illustration is the decision of the Supreme Court. This act gives no greater right than that given at the close of the war.

Mr. BENNET. There is another case of a man living in Ohio, a loyal man, who had a line of steamers on the Mississippi at the beginning of the war. That line of steamers was seized by the Confederate States. However, they made him work them, too, which of course by superior force they had the right to do. After he had worked them some time, Banks or Butler captured everything down there. He remained down there and ran these steamers for the Federal Government. He got a permit either from Butler or Banks to go across the line and negotiate with the Confederate authorities for pay for the work that he had done and for the use of his steamers, and they gave him quite a quantity of cotton in payment. He brought that back across the line under permit of these Federal generals and subsequently it was seized because the permit was not from the President but from the generals, a mere technicality. Now, I want to ask the gentleman whether this act would help out that Ohio man, who seems, as far as I can say, to have been misused by everybody all around. Now, that property was not strictly—or was that property "captured and abandoned property"?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I do not quite understand the gentleman. Did the gentleman say that it was purchased from the Confederacy? Where the property was purchased from the Confederacy he can not recover.

Mr. BENNET. I do not think the gentleman heard all my question. This man was a loyal man from Ohio and he was caught down the river with a line of steamers, and the Confederate authorities, having the power, not only took his steamers but made him work the steamers. Then when Gen. Butler or Gen. Banks came down and captured that territory he got back his steamers which were left and he got permission from the Federal generals to go through the lines to the Confederate authorities; and they, out of a sense of justice, paid him in the only thing they had to pay with—they paid him in cotton. And acting under that authority, the permission of these Federal generals, he brought that cotton back to the line; and when he got it back to the line somebody ordered it seized, because under the law of 1862, I think, the permit to go through the lines and get cotton must come from the President and not from the generals. And they took his cotton and sold it and put the proceeds in the Treasury. Now, I ask the gentleman if that comes within the statute or if it does not?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. The gentleman asks me a very interesting question, and I will tell him if they did not want him to recover they never should appoint me to fill the vacancy on the Court of Claims, because I would find for him.

Mr. BENNET. You would be in his favor?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I would be in his favor.

I call the gentleman's attention to the nonintercourse act. The question is whether or not that was a purchase for the Confederacy, whether he purchased with his labor or not. I believe the gentleman has such a case that he ought to have the right under this bill to go into the Court of Claims and try his case. I think it is for that court to decide whether or not he is entitled to it. If this bill passes the gentleman from New York has a chance to prove his case, and if it does not pass he has no chance. He ought not to have the right to go under a private bill introduced by the gentleman from New York or anybody else, because that is an unfair proceeding to have one man go down and have his case adjudicated in the court and others not be given that right. This bill gives the right to that court to settle it and relieves Congress from the burden of considering it. If Congress does not grant this right these people are going to come to Congress and present bills, and I do not blame them, because they have more justice in them than any other war claims ever presented here.

Mr. BENNET. Does not the gentleman see the predicament I am in? The gentleman is an able and brilliant lawyer——

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I must deny both allegations.

Mr. BENNET (continuing). And is familiar with this class of legislation, and I, being from New York City, am not very familiar with it. I am asking him frankly. I will have to vote on this bill. Does this cover the case of that particular claim?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I will tell the gentleman as frankly that in my opinion it would. But I believe the gentleman's sense of justice will impel him to vote for this bill, not with regard to one particular case, but because it may cover others. The gentleman is a lawyer, and I think he will agree that his client, or his Ohio friend as a client, in that court ought to receive justice at the hands of the court if he can prove his property was turned into the Treasury. Do you not think so?

Mr. BENNET. I can see the justice in that, of course; and limiting my remarks for the moment to the particular case I have described, it does seem to me that that man was about the most thoroughly abused man that I ever heard of.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. About the worst I ever heard of, too.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Gladly.

Mr. STAFFORD. Though this bill proposes to merely revive the law of the sixties, nevertheless it differs from the bill that we passed this afternoon in that you grant to the claimants the right to go into the Court of Claims direct, whereas in the committee this afternoon we voted down an amendment granting to all who had claims for use and occupation and for stores appropriated by the Union Army the right to present their claims directly to the Court of Claims. Why should not Congress, through the Committee on War Claims, 50 years after the claims arose, first pass upon the question of the prima facie character of the rightfulness of these claims before submitting them to the Court of Claims along the lines embodied in the bill which has passed the House?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I will answer the gentleman. The only reason is this: There is very little room for argument in it, because this is the only class of cases that we know of that are susceptible of proof by the records of the Treasury Department. There is no question about this class of cases. In the claims for use and occupation there is the question as to whether there was destruction, whether there was incidental damage, and other questions intervene, but no such questions can arise here. The only question that can arise is, Is the claimant, according to the Treasury Department books, entitled to this money?

Mr. STAFFORD. Is not there this difference, that when this act of Congress was originally passed loyalty was one of the conditions precedent to the maintenance of the claim?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Under this act the language is not changed.

Mr. STAFFORD. Since the amnesty proclamation of President Lincoln there would be many that would be covered into this act, who were not originally covered into it because of this loyalty provision.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Because of the decision of the Supreme Court; yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Should not the Congress, through the Committee on War Claims, determine that question of loyalty, so that we should not vote these claims to those who were disloyal in time of the war, notwithstanding the decision of the Supreme Court?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I do not think so, for the reason that if at a time shortly after the close of the Civil War, when there was bitter feeling growing out of the war, the Supreme Court, as then constituted, and looking into this bill nearer to the time it was passed, could say that Congress never intended to take this property away from those people, and could say further that the President of the United States, when he granted that amnesty, did not intend to deceive them, but intended to restore to them their property rights, I do not think that the gentleman from Wisconsin or any other Member of Congress should take the position that Congress now should do what was not done even then by the court or anybody else.

Mr. STAFFORD. Congress only granted this relief to those who were loyal. This is the first instance where any Congress proposes to grant relief to claimants who were disloyal. Why should Congress pay the claims of those who were disloyal?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Because this property was not taken to carry on the war, but was, according to the Supreme Court, converted into a trust fund.

Mr. STAFFORD. The question is whether we should now open the door to all those claimants who were disloyal to the Government in the time of the Civil War. That is a very fundamental question in this case, as I view it.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. For the reason I stated just now, that when the President of the United States granted a pardon upon the condition that where a man took the oath of allegiance his property rights should be restored to him, and those rights were given to him, no Congress should come now and take them away from him. Any man who advocates that being done, in the face of the decision of the Supreme Court, is not treating those people with the fairness and justice to which they are entitled, when their property was not converted into money for use in carrying on the war, but was specifically placed in the Treasury as a trust fund.

Mr. Chairman, I reserve the remainder of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has four minutes remaining.

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. This bill applies only to cases where the property was sold and the money was turned into the Treasury of the United States, and it has been held all these years in the Treasury as a trust fund for the benefit of the claimant.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. That money was turned into the Treasury. That is substantially a correct statement.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Is that a separate fund?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. In answer to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, I will say that it was held as a separate fund for many years, and later, by a resolution, it was covered into the general funds of the Treasury.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. LLOYD, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 8246) to revive the right of action under the act of March 12, 1863 (12 Stat. L., 820), and had come to no resolution thereon.

RURAL DELIVERY.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the Post Office appropriation bill, by incorporating a petition and a resolution of the grange upon the subject of rural delivery.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the Post Office appropriation bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SCHALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on the same subject.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. SCHALL] asks unanimous consent to extend remarks in the RECORD on the Post Office appropriation bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the subcommittee of the Committee on the Judiciary investigating the impeachment charges of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BUCHANAN] against H. Snowden Marshall, district attorney for the southern district of New York, be excused from attendance on the sessions of the House for the next two weeks.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. CARLIN] asks unanimous consent that the subcommittee of the Judiciary Committee investigating the impeachment charges which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BUCHANAN] made against the district attorney for the southern district of New York be excused from attendance on the sessions of the House for two weeks. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, what will be the effect of this?

Mr. CARLIN. The effect of this will be that the subcommittee, finding it necessary to hold hearings in the city of New York, will be unable to attend the sessions of the House.

Mr. MANN. Supposing there is a call of the House and an order for the arrest of absentees. There would be nothing in the RECORD to show the names of the gentlemen who constitute the subcommittee, so that the warrant would be issued against all members of it unless the gentleman names the members.

Mr. CARLIN. I can relieve that situation by stating that the subcommittee consists of Mr. CARLIN of Virginia, Mr. GARD of Ohio, and Mr. NELSON of Wisconsin.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent that the members of the subcommittee of the Judiciary Committee investigating the impeachment charges against the district attorney for the southern district of New York—Messrs. CARLIN of Virginia, GARD of Ohio, and NELSON of Wisconsin—be excused from attendance on the sessions of the House for two weeks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 2 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, February 24, 1916, at 12 o'clock noon.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I desire to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. THOMAS] on account of sickness.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-seven Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

The VICE PRESIDENT announced his signature to the enrolled joint resolution (H. J. Res. 89) to amend an act entitled "An act granting pensions and increase of pension to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war," approved February 25, 1915, which had heretofore been signed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives.

LOYALTY OF HUNGARIAN-AMERICAN CITIZENS.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to present and have printed in the RECORD resolutions adopted at a mass meeting of American citizens of Hungarian birth held at the Garden Theater, New York City, on the 30th of January, 1916. At this meeting I had the honor to deliver an address on Americanism to this great patriotic gathering of emigrant citizens and also to read a telegram from President Wilson, which I desire to have appear in the RECORD, together with the resolutions.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

The following resolutions were read and passed by acclamation at the great mass meeting of American citizens of Hungarian birth held at the Garden Theater in New York on the afternoon of January 30, 1916:

"Resolutions.

"Whereas we, American citizens of Hungarian birth, are firmly and unshakably convinced of the absolute loyalty to this country, first, last, and all the time of all American citizens of Hungarian origin, a conviction born of our knowledge of their principles, conduct, and traditions; and

"Whereas immediate and effectual protest and protection are needed by these loyal citizens, resident in many States of the Union, against the insinuations, suggestions, and accusations of disloyalty of American citizens born in any one of the central-power States, brought not alone from interested and subterranean sources but also from quarters unconsciously biased by them; and

"Whereas public opinion in this country has been led to connect, without proof or justification, the loyal American citizens of Hungarian birth with the real or alleged plottings of foreign agents; and

"Whereas these insinuations, suggestions, and accusations and this misguided public opinion have aroused a feeling of suspicion and antagonism in this country against citizens of Hungarian origin; and

"Whereas the present campaign of preparedness through the strengthening of the Nation's Army and Navy, laudatory and timely though it may be, is not adequate without some plan for broader schooling and propaganda of a kind to unite all the people of America still more closely: Be it therefore

"Resolved, That we, here gathered together, representing the American citizenry of Hungarian origin, with a renewal of the pledge of their and our unwavering loyalty, protest against the constant, systematic, and increasing campaign of vilification consciously and unconsciously carried on by the agencies mentioned above; and be it further

"Resolved, That this meeting, with the certainty that what it attempts is within its rights on the strength of the American citizenship of its members, take the proper steps to safeguard the rights of American citizens of Hungarian birth; to show their real light to the eyes of the Nation; to devise means of dissipating the present groundless and unjust attitude of suspicion and antagonism; to prevent its continuance and the possibility of its recurrence at any future time; and be it further

"Resolved, That the means and action decided upon by this meeting shall be directed toward the realization of an ever more complete absorption in and by the Nation of the racial stocks that go to the making up of its citizenship; and be it further

"Resolved, That we respectfully enlist the sympathy and aid of our President and of our National Legislature in bringing about so imperative, ideal, and patriotic a conclusion; and be it finally

"Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be sent to the President and each Member of Congress."

GREETINGS FROM PRESIDENT WILSON.

The telegram from President Wilson was as follows:

"Hon. OLLIE M. JAMES,
"St. Regis, New York City:

"May I not send my warmest greetings to the meeting, and will you not express for me my very deepest and sincerest confidence in the entire loyalty and patriotism of the great body of our fellow citizens who have strengthened and enriched America by adding their energy to our own out of the nations which have joined their stocks to make a great America?

"WOODROW WILSON."

MUSKINGUM RIVER, OHIO, CONTRACT.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President, I wish the Senate would be gracious enough to allow me unanimous consent to submit a committee report and give immediate action to an important local bill. It will take only just a moment.

If I may at this time offer an explanation, it is a bill with the unanimous approval of the Committee on Commerce directing the Secretary of War to abrogate a contract for a power plant on the Muskingum River, a tributary of the Ohio in my State. The reason for the immediate passage of the bill is that the company which secured the contract found the plan of building a power plant on the Muskingum utterly impracticable. It has already paid the Government $8,000 in rental and must abandon the project. The Secretary of War gave informal approval to its cancellation, but owing to the retirement of the Secretary of War and conditions in the War Department it is impossible to get a formal expression.

The matter has been fully discussed in the committee, and it is quite unanimous that the right thing to do is to cancel the contract. I should like to have the Senate hear the report and pass the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection?

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I think if we are going into that matter at all, we ought to have a little time for morning business. Some of the rest of us have matters that we think are reasonably important.

Personally, Mr. President, I regret that the morning business is being cut out by recesses instead of an adjournment of the Senate. There are nearly 100 bills on the calendar that ought to be considered. Not one of them is of interest to me, but every one is of interest to some Senator. It seems to me that we ought to give some little attention not only to the calendar but to routine morning business.

I will suggest to the Senator having in charge the unfinished business, that he might consent to half an hour or thereabouts of to-day that we might present routine morning business, not going to the calendar but that we might present certain matters, such as the Senator from Ohio is interested in, and in that way make some progress in matters other than the consideration of this bill, which has been before the Senate for 17 days, and no one sees any hope of its being concluded. If we are going to have our morning business cut out day by day by recesses of the Senate to consider this bill, which has taken so much time, to be followed by another bill, I understand, that will take equally as much time, I think an injustice is being done to the Senate by that procedure.

I do not object, of course, to the request of the Senator from Ohio.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. HARDING. I am directed by the Committee on Commerce, to which was referred the bill (S. 4026) authorizing and directing the Secretary of War to abrogate a contract lease of land and water power on the Muskingum River, Ohio, to report it favorably with an amendment, and I submit a report (No. 165) thereon. I ask for the present consideration of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole. The amendment was to add at the end of the bill the following words: "The Secretary of War is hereby directed to collect no rental under lease other than that already paid in full for the first year of the contract," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be authorized, and he is hereby directed, to abrogate a contract lease entered into on the 28th day of February, 1913, between said Secretary of War, for the United States of America, and William W. Mills, of Marietta, Ohio, and S. D. Camden and Henry H. Archer, of Parkersburg, W. Va., for the land and water power at Dams Nos. 3, 4, 5, and 6 on the Muskingum River, in the State of Ohio. The Secretary of War is hereby directed to collect no rental under lease other than that already paid in full for the first year of the contract.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

STATUE OF JAMES BUCHANAN.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I desire, by unanimous consent, of course, to make a favorable report from the Committee on the Library and to have the joint resolution to which it refers go to the calendar.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, these matters are now proceeding by unanimous consent. I do not object to this report; but, Mr. President, day after day we have been taking a recess here and cutting out all morning business. The result is that yesterday, all during the consideration of the unfinished business, Senators would drop in from time to time and by unanimous consent proceed to transact morning business while the unfinished business was under consideration.

Now, I am opposed to that, and I shall object to any further unanimous consent for the transaction of morning business until we can take an adjournment and have the regular morning hour.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, pending the request of the Senator from Mississippi, I ask unanimous consent that three-fourths of an hour be devoted to morning business to-day.

Mr. HARDWICK. Not less.

Mr. GALLINGER. Not less than three-fourths of an hour.

Mr. SHIELDS. I did not understand the Senator's request. Is it for to-day or hereafter?

Mr. GALLINGER. Simply for to-day.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, it would be better for us to adjourn to-day and have the regular morning hour to-morrow, and then we would all be prepared for it. A good many of us have not brought matters we would have brought if there was to be morning business transacted to-day because we knew we would not have any morning hour; but I think we ought to adjourn to-day and transact morning business to-morrow.

Mr. GALLINGER. If we can have the assurance that we will adjourn to-day and have the morning hour to-morrow, it will suit my convenience; but otherwise I shall ask the Senate to give us a little time to transact the usual morning business this morning.

Mr. SHIELDS. I would object to laying aside the unfinished business for morning business this morning. I will not interfere, however, with any reasonable request upon that matter, so far as I am concerned; but yesterday the Senate took a recess until this morning, and I think there were Senators desirous of addressing the Senate on the subject of this bill, and we should proceed with the unfinished business.

Mr. HARDWICK. I wish to ask just one question. Will we have an adjournment of the Senate to-day?

Mr. SHIELDS. I shall offer no objection.

Mr. HARDWICK. All right.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I think that will give us all an opportunity to have morning business transacted.

Mr. GALLINGER. With that understanding, I have no further suggestion to make.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the report submitted by the Senator from Mississippi being received?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I did not object to that, but I shall object to the transaction of any further morning business this morning.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be stated by title.

The SECRETARY. A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 93) authorizing the erection on the public grounds in the city of Washington, D. C., of a statue of James Buchanan, a former President of the United States. (S. Rept. 166.)

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be placed on the calendar.

DEVELOPMENT OF WATER POWER.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3331) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of dams across navigable waters," approved June 21, 1906, as amended by the act approved June 23, 1910, and to provide for the improvement and development of waterways for the uses of interstate and foreign commerce.

Mr. NORRIS and Mr. WORKS addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is objection to any further morning business.

Mr. NORRIS. I was going to address myself to the bill. I do not want to interfere with the Senator from California, however.

Mr. WORKS. I simply desire to offer an amendment and to have it printed and lie on the table.

During the debate on yesterday the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] rather challenged me to offer an amendment to the bill that would cover what he really desires and at the same time not be offensive to my own views as to what this legislation should be. I am always glad to oblige the Senator from Alabama, and I now offer an amendment in the nature of a substitute for the bill and ask that it be printed and lie on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be so ordered.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON], I observe, gave notice that he would address the Senate to-day. I was not aware of that when I addressed the Chair for the purpose of submitting some remarks on the amendment which is now pending. I understand that the Senator from Iowa is prepared to go on, and I am perfectly willing to yield the floor and allow him to proceed.

Mr. KENYON. I wish to state that I shall take about an hour, so that Senators can retire and be back at that time.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. KENYON. I do.

Mr. GORE. I desire to offer a concurrent resolution, and ask that it be printed and go over under the rule.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is objection. It can not be received.

Mr. GORE. I ask that the resolution may be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is objection. The unfinished business is before the Senate and nothing can be received except by unanimous consent.

Mr. GORE. I understood a moment ago that unanimous consent had been granted for morning business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. No; it had not been granted, and there is objection.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Not knowing the character of the request, I reserve the right to object after I am acquainted with it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is not any doubt about what the rule is. When the unfinished business is before the Senate it requires unanimous consent in order to give way for any purpose whatever.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I understand that, but I wish to reserve the right to object under the rule.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The objection has been made. The Chair is not responsible for it. He is simply enforcing the rule.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Objection has been made?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection has been made.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh, well; I did not so understand. I beg the Chair's pardon.

NATIONAL CHILD LABOR LAW.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I want to address myself for not more than the time of the morning hour in the discussion of a bill that is not before the Senate, but which is in committee and will soon be here. I speak at this time especially because of some influences that are being brought to bear against the bill.

During the closing days of the last session the House passed what was known as the Palmer-Owen Child Labor Act. It was passed too late for action by the Senate, but it was reported from the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce during the closing days of the session with some amendments. It was, however, never acted upon by the Senate. To that bill I want now to draw the attention of the Senate. It is now known as the Owen-Keating bill.

I know, Mr. President, that we are in a period of reaction; that anyone seeking to secure legislation along humanitarian lines is regarded as a dreamer, a sentimentalist, and a reformer, and the term seems to have become with many one of reproach. However, at the risk of such seemingly opprobrious epithets, I am going to plead, as best I may, with the Senate to take action at this session for the enactment of a national child-labor law. The fight for such a law commenced in Congress about 1907, a bill then being introduced by Senator Beveridge, and championed by him with great ability and courage. I have introduced the Beveridge bill, with a few changes, at every session since I have been a Member of the Senate, but it has never gotten very far. Representative COPLEY introduced in the House a child-labor bill on a somewhat different principle; and the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] introduced in the Senate a bill, which is the same, I understand, as the Keating bill in the House, which was reported from the committee with amendments at the last session of the Senate. In order to have the record complete, without reading them, I ask to insert, as a part of my remarks, at this point these various bills.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, permission to do so will be granted.

The bills referred to are as follows:

A bill (H. R. 8234) to prevent interstate commerce in the products of child labor, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That no producer, manufacturer, or dealer shall ship or deliver for shipment in interstate commerce the product of any mine or quarry situated in the United States which has been produced, in whole or part, by the labor of children under the age of 16 years, or the product of any mill, cannery, workshop, factory, or manufacturing establishment situated in the United States which has been produced, in whole or in part, by the labor of children under the age of 14 years or by the labor of children between the ages of 14 years and 16 years who work more than eight hours in any one day, or more than six days in any one week, or after the hour of 7 o'clock p. m., or before the hour of 7 o'clock a. m.

SEC. 3. That the Attorney General, the Secretary of Commerce, and the Secretary of Labor shall constitute a board to make and publish from time to time uniform rules and regulations for carrying out the provisions of this act.

SEC. 4. Said guaranty, to afford the protection above provided, shall contain the name and address of the person giving the same.

SEC. 7. That the word "dealer" or the word "person" as used in this act shall be construed to include any individual or corporation or the members of any partnership or other unincorporated association. The term "ship or deliver for shipment in interstate commerce" as used in this act means to ship or deliver for shipment from any State or Territory or the District of Columbia to or through any other State or Territory or the District of Columbia.

SEC. 8. That in prosecutions under this act each shipment or delivery for shipment shall constitute a separate offense.

SEC. 4. That it shall be the duty of each district attorney to whom the Secretary of Labor shall report any violation of this act, or to whom any State factory or mining or quarry inspector, commissioner of labor, State medical inspector, or school-attendance officer, or any other person shall present satisfactory evidence of any such violation to cause appropriate proceedings to be commenced and prosecuted in the proper courts of the United States without delay for the enforcement of the penalties as in such cases herein provided.

SEC. 5. That any person, partnership, association, or corporation, or any agent or employee thereof manufacturing, producing, or dealing in the products of any mine, quarry, mill, cannery, workshop, factory, or manufacturing establishment who shall violate any of the provisions of section 1 of this act, or who shall refuse or obstruct the entry or inspection authorized by section 3 of this act, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and shall be punished by a fine of not more than $1,000 nor less than $100, or by imprisonment for not more than one year nor less than one month, or by both fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the court: Provided, That no dealer shall be subject to conviction under the provisions of this section, who shall establish a guaranty issued by the person by whom such goods were manufactured or produced, and residing in the United States, to the effect that in the manufacture and production of such goods, neither in whole nor in part, had children been employed or permitted to work in any mine or quarry under the age of 16 years, or in any mill, cannery, workshop, factory, or manufacturing establishment under the age of 14 years, or between the ages of 14 and 16 years who worked more than eight hours in any one day, or more than six days in any week, or after the hours of 7 o'clock postmeridian or before the hour of 7 o'clock antemeridian. The word "dealer" as used in this act shall be construed to include only any individual or corporation, or the members of any partnership or other unincorporated association who is a wholesaler or jobber.

SEC. 6. That in prosecutions under this act each shipment or delivery for shipment shall constitute a separate offense.

SEC. 7. That this act shall take effect from and after one year from the date of its passage.

Be it enacted, etc., That six months from and after the passage of this act no carrier of interstate commerce shall transport or accept for transportation the products of any factory, canning mill, workshop, or mine in which children under 14 years of age are employed or permitted to work, which products are offered to said interstate carrier by the firm, person, or corporation owning or operating said factory or mine, or any officer or agent or servant thereof, for transportation into any other State or Territory than the one in which said factory is located.

SEC. 2. That no carrier of interstate commerce shall transport or accept for transportation the products of any factory or mine offered it for transportation by any person, firm, or corporation which owns or operates such factory or mine, or any officer, agent, or servant of such person, firm, or corporation, until the president or secretary or general manager of such corporation or a member of such firm or the person owning or operating such factory or mine shall file with said carrier an affidavit to the effect that children under 14 years of age are not employed in such factory or mine.

SEC. 3. That the form of said affidavit shall be prescribed by the Secretary of the Department of Labor. After the first affidavit is filed a like affidavit shall be filed, on or before July 1 and on or before December 31 of each year, with the interstate carrier to which such factory or mine offers its products for transportation; and after the first affidavit subsequent affidavits shall also state that no children under 14 years of age are employed or permitted to work in said factory or mine or have been employed or permitted to work in said factory or mine at any time during the preceding six months.

SEC. 4. That any officer or agent of a carrier of interstate commerce who is a party to any violation of this act or who knowingly violates any of the provisions of this act shall be punished for each offense by a fine of not more than $10,000 nor less than $1,000, or by imprisonment for not more than six months nor less than one month, or by both said fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the court. Any person by this act required to file the affidavit herein provided for who fails or refuses to file such affidavit or who shall make a false statement in said affidavit shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $20,000 nor less than $5,000, or by imprisonment not exceeding one year nor less than three months, or by both said fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the court.

A bill to further regulate interstate and foreign commerce by prohibiting interstate transportation of the products of certain forms of child labor, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That the labor of children in certain industries and under certain conditions hereinafter described is hereby defined as antisocial child labor, and that this act shall be known, referred to, and cited as the Federal child-labor act.

SEC. 2. That the employment of a child under 14 years of age in any mill, factory, cannery, workshop, manufacturing or mechanical establishment, or of a child under 16 years of age in any coal mine, coal breaker, coke oven, quarry, or in any establishment where poisonous or dangerous acids, gases, or dyes are used, manufactured, or packed, or in any establishment wherein the work done or materials or equipment handled are dangerous to the life and limb or injurious to the health or morals of such a child, is hereby designated and defined as antisocial child labor and as detrimental to the general welfare and debasing to commerce.

SEC. 3. That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of Labor, within six months after the passage of this act, to classify and make public a list of such businesses or industries as are included within those described in section 2 of this act, together with a list of the products of such businesses or industries; and it shall be the duty of the Secretary of Labor to revise from time to time said public list as the changing character of industrial establishments or additional information received by the Secretary of Labor shall warrant and require.

SEC. 4. That any person, firm, or corporation which owns or operates a business or establishment designated in section 2 of this act and included within those businesses or industries listed by the Secretary of Labor as herein required, may make or cause to be made by his duly authorized agent an affidavit to the effect that no antisocial child labor is employed in his business or establishment, and that the products thereof are not produced with the aid of antisocial child labor. When such an affidavit in the form duly approved by the Secretary of Labor is filed with the Secretary of Labor, the Secretary of Labor shall issue a certificate to the maker of the said affidavit, or to the person, firm, or corporation in whose behalf said affidavit is made, giving authority to said person, firm, or corporation to stamp or label the goods and products of such business or establishment in the following manner: "Registered under the Federal child-labor act, Serial No. ——." The serial number certified by the Secretary of Labor shall be the number given to the affidavit on file by virtue of which said certificate is made as herein provided.

SEC. 5. That six months from and after the passage of this act no carrier of interstate commerce shall knowingly accept for initial interstate transportation or knowingly transport initially in interstate commerce the goods or products of any business or establishment described in section 2 of this act and included within those businesses or industries listed by the Secretary of Labor as herein provided which have been made with the aid of antisocial child labor or have been made in any business or establishment in which antisocial child labor is employed; and no jobber, wholesaler, manufacturer, producer, or other dealer in such goods and products shall knowingly make initial shipment or knowingly offer for initial shipment in interstate commerce any such goods or products so made: Provided, however, That in case any such goods or products the interstate transportation whereof is hereby prohibited shall be presented for transportation and transported, stamped and labeled "Registered under the Federal child-labor act, serial No. —," as provided in section 4 of this act, the carrier, jobber, wholesaler, or other dealer in such goods or products, excepting the manufacturer or producer thereof, responsible for such interstate transportation shall be presumed to have been ignorant of the fact that such goods or products were of the character prohibited by this act.

SEC. 6. That within six months from and after passage of this act the Secretary of Labor shall examine the laws of the several States relating to the employment of child labor and give public notice and certify to the governor of each of the several States whether or not, in the opinion of the Secretary of Labor, the law of each particular State substantially prohibits and effectively prevents antisocial child labor as herein defined; and the Secretary of Labor shall from time to time make such revision of his certificate regarding the laws of the several States as the changes therein, or additional information by him received, shall warrant or require; and for the purposes of this act the judgment and decision of the Secretary of Labor as to whether the laws of a particular State substantially prohibit and effectively prevent antisocial child labor as herein defined shall be final. The provisions of this act prohibiting interstate transportation of the products of antisocial child labor as herein defined shall not apply either to the carrier of interstate commerce or to the manufacturer, producer, jobber, wholesaler, or other dealer offering for interstate transportation, or accepting for or transporting in interstate transportation, any initial shipment from a State certified by the Secretary of Labor as prohibiting and preventing antisocial child labor into any other State or Territory.

SEC. 7. That any officer or agent of any carrier of interstate commerce, or of any person firm, or corporation, or any other person who knowingly is a party to any violation of this act, or who knowingly violates any provision of this act, shall be punished for each offense by fine of not more than $5,000 nor less than $100, or by imprisonment for not more than one year, or by both said fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the court. Any person making affidavit to the Secretary of Labor, as provided in section 3, and making a false statement in such affidavit, or any person stamping or labeling goods or products in the manner provided in section 4 of this act, without authority from the Secretary of Labor as provided in said section, shall be punished by fine not exceeding $5,000 nor less than $100, or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or by both said fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the court.

SEC. 8. That any person required, for the protection of a carrier of interstate commerce, to make a written statement as to whether or not goods or products are offered for initial shipment as herein defined, or have been produced with the aid of antisocial child labor, who knowingly makes a false statement in writing in response to such inquiry, shall be fined not exceeding $5,000 nor less than $100; and any carrier of interstate commerce is hereby empowered and permitted to refuse to accept for interstate transportation any goods or products regarding which the shipper refuses to make such written statement upon demand of said carrier.

SEC. 9. That the term "interstate transportation" as used in this act is hereby defined as all transportation which is a part of interstate commerce comprised within the term "commerce among the several States" as used in the Constitution of the United States. The term "business or establishment" as used in this act is hereby defined as any place where work is done for compensation of any sort. The word "person" as used in this act is hereby defined to include any individual, male or female, any partnership or other unincorporated or incorporated organization, or any municipality, public or private institution or organization. The masculine pronoun wherever used in this act shall include other genders, and the singular number shall include the plural. The term "goods or products" shall include any substance, article, or chattel of any kind made or produced or upon which or in connection with which any kind of work is done in any business or establishment as defined in this act. The term "initial shipment" or "initial transportation" or similar term as used in this act is hereby defined as the first shipment or transportation of goods or products in interstate transportation subsequent to their production or manufacture.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, the question of a national child-labor law is not a partisan question. The Republican national convention practically declared for it; the Progressive convention declared for it; and the Democratic House of Representatives has twice passed it by tremendous majorities. Since 1907, when former Senator Beveridge commenced his fight for a child-labor law, a large number of the States of the Union have passed laws against child labor, and the awakened moral conscience of the people of this country has been instrumental in securing the passage of those bills in various States.

At this time when the attention of Congress is riveted upon the proposition of preparedness—preparedness for war, getting ready to kill people—it might be advantageous to pause and consider, as a part of real preparedness, a preparedness for peace, to comprehend, if we can, the larger vision of our country's future. Preparedness for war and for peace demands the conservation of the citizenship of the Nation and the stopping of child labor in factories and mines and dangerous employments where children are injured and stunted, and so enters into the broader question of preparedness because it relates vitally to the future citizenship of the Republic, to the moral fiber of our people.

The Nation is concerned in raising strong men to protect it and strong mothers to raise the soldiers of the future, if occasion shall arise, but it is fully as much interested, if not more so, in raising strong men and women to fight the battles of peace in the trenches of private life, to preserve the great civilization of the future. The greatest asset of the Nation is its children, and the character of its citizenship depends upon the conservation of its children.

I desire to discuss this question in three divisions:

First. The need of child-labor laws;

Second. The need of a national child-labor law; and Third. The constitutional question involved in a national child-labor law.

FIRST, WHY A CHILD-LABOR LAW AT ALL?

That raises the question: Why child labor?

The answer is simple: It is to get cheap labor, to increase profits and dividends, the placing of commercialism before humanity.

Pastor Stöcker, in a speech on child and female labor in the German Reichstag, said:

> We have put the question the wrong way. We have asked: How much child and female labor does industry need in order to flourish, to pay dividends, and to sell goods abroad? Whereas we ought to have asked: How ought industry to be organized in order to protect and foster the family, the human individual, and the Christian life?

When I listened to a number of well-fed, prosperous manufacturers contending before the committee a few days ago for the right to employ children and for the right of children to work, I thought of the words of Ernest Crosby, that great bard militant, who spoke for certain of our "captains of industry." He made them say:

> So we draw up the armies of trade,
> And invade,
> With the children in front to fall first, as is meet—
> Children of mill and of sweatshop and mine.
> And behind them the women stand,
> Jaded and wan in line;
> Then comes the hosts of the diggers and builders, artisans, craftsmen, and all.
> It is fine.
> It is grand!
> Let them fall:
> We are safe in the rear with the loot in our hand.

According to the occupation statistics of the 1910 census the number of children between 10 and 15 years of age engaged in gainful occupations as compared with the number in 1880 is as follows:

In 1910, 1,990,225, or 18.4 per cent.
In 1900, 1,750,178, or 18.2 per cent.
In 1880, 1,118,356, or 16.8 per cent.
In 1910, male, 1,353,139; female, 637,086.
In 1900, male, 1,262,411; female, 485,767.
In 1880, male, 825,187; female, 293,169.
In 1910, male, 24.8 per cent; female, 11.9 per cent.
In 1900, male, 26.1 per cent; female, 10.2 per cent.
In 1880, male, 24.4 per cent; female, 9 per cent.

It should be stated that of these figures in the census of 1910 there were engaged in agricultural pursuits 1,431,254, and in nonagricultural pursuits 558,971. It is hopeful that there was a marked decrease in the number engaged in nonagricultural pursuits, and that less were engaged in these pursuits in 1910 than in 1900.

The injury arising from child labor is twofold: First, to the State, and, second, to the child itself.

AS TO THE STATE.

Child labor is not economical labor. It reduces the standard of wages; it makes pauperism, crime, disease. Efficient labor must be intelligent labor. Child labor is not intelligent labor. There is nothing to be said in its favor except that at certain times, when great misfortune comes upon families, the labor of children is said to be absolutely necessary to preserve the lives of the families. This is not, however, a good argument. Far better would it be to have some system of pensioning children or pensioning families. It would be more economical and cheaper for the Nation than to lose or dwarf its child life. Think of the economic waste in the destruction of the power of the child when grown to manhood.

We seem to have inherited child labor from England. It was a bad inheritance. A study of child labor in the United States, by Edith Abott, in the American Journal of Sociology for July, 1908, and rewritten in Woman in Industry in 1910, goes into the matter quite thoroughly as to the employment of children in early colonial times in this country.

Child labor, of course, was born of greed—the desire to have cheaper labor and increased profits. England had been employing children and women in trades for centuries. At an early day what was known as the poor law was passed in England, in which it was declared that idleness was "the mother and root of all thefts, robberies, and evil acts, and other mischiefs," and one of the curative measures was one advocating the employment of children. The Elizabethan poor law exacted the "setting to work of children of all such whose parents shall not be thought able to keep and maintain their children." It is little wonder, with the English notions upon child labor, that there were importations of children to the colonies in the early days and that child labor grew up in this country.

Gov. Moore, of New York, in 1767 reported to the lords of trade that "every house swarms with children, who are set to work as soon as they are able to spin and card." In Washington's papers is found an account relative to two early New England manufactories which had advanced beyond that of the one established at Philadelphia in that the work was carried on at factories instead of at home, but the machinery had not advanced beyond the primitive hand wheels.

I wish to insert these words found in Washington's Papers, referring to the Boston duck manufactory, without taking the time to read them.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, permission is granted.

The matter referred to is as follows:

They have 28 looms at work and 14 girls spinning with both hands—the flax being tied to their waist. Children—(girls)—turned the wheels for them, and with this assistance each spinner can turn out 14 pounds of thread per day when they stick to it.

He further states that at the Haverhill duck manufactory the work was further advanced:

One small person turns a wheel which employs 8 spinners, each acting independently of each other, so as to occasion no interruption to the rest if any one of them is stopped, whereas at the Boston manufactory of this article each spinner had a small girl to turn the wheel.

Mr. KENYON. Alexander Hamilton, in his report on manufactures, brought out the fact that women and children so employed would be "more useful and the latter more early useful than they would otherwise be." He referred to the cotton industry of England, in which it was estimated that four-sevenths of all those employed were women and children, the greater number of which were children and many of them of tender age. Children were looked upon, in the early stages of the nineteenth century, and valued according to the amount of labor they could perform and the amount of revenue that could be produced from their services in some mill.

The factory act was passed by Parliament in 1802 limiting the hours to 12 a day.

Dr. McKelway, who has taken a great interest in this subject, in an article, says:

This was the beginning of a hundred years of battle for a proper standard of legislation on this vital subject, to which England has but just attained. If it were not such a tragedy that the remedial measures should have been so slowly adopted, it would be a humorous study, the various protests of the manufacturers and other employers of child labor—

And we have the same protests now—to the effect that their business would be ruined by the next small advance proposed. Dickens satirizes this in Hard Times, when he mentions how often Coketown had been "destroyed" and how often the ultimatum had been delivered by the factory owners that they would prefer pitching their mills "into the Atlantic Ocean" rather than submit to the proposed restriction, whatever it happened to be.

The result of child labor in England can not be cited as any argument advancing the strength of the British Empire. In fact, exactly the opposite argument could be made. Recent writers have claimed that the failure of England in the present war to make any showing in accordance with her high honor and tradition is due to industrialism, which has crushed out the hope and the aspiration of English workingmen and has stunted her children in factories and mills. Be that as it may, during the Boer War it is true that in Manchester, the home of the factory child, 8,000 out of 12,000 recruits were rejected as utterly unfit, and of the 4,000 retained only a scant 1,000 were really up to the requirements, and it is said that comparisons of the records of the Crimean War half a century before proved that the average height had decreased 3 inches and the average weight about 30 pounds. As one of the magazines expressed it:

The men that faced the Malakoff and stormed Sebastopol were no more * * *; then the typical Englishman that went to war—the John Bull of tradition—was broad-shouldered and deep-chested, a ruddy-cheeked giant, then the brawn and endurance of the Englishman were a proverb. Against him Hooligan, anæmic, neurotic, emaciated, too often degenerate, dull of wit and feeble of will, showed like a figure of fright.

True the recent words of Chesterton—

Hamlets breaking, homesteads drifting, peasants tramping, towns erased;
Lo, my Lords, we gave you England, and you gave us back a waste.
Yea, a desert, labeled "England," where you know (and well you know)
That the village Hampdens wither and the village idiots grow,
That the pride of grass grows mighty and the hope of man grows small.
Will you call on croft and village? Let the rabbits hear your call.
Would you call upon the people? Would you waken these things, then?
Call on God, whose name is pity; do not ask too much of men.

Of course some men in England like Shaftesbury, with the interest of humanity close to their heart, made a fight against child labor; also Robert Owen and Sir Robert Peel. They were opposed by some of the strongest of English statesmen, and the fight known as the factory movement gave rise to a great conflict between individualism and collectivism. Dicey, in his lectures upon the relation between law and public opinion in England during the nineteenth century, has discussed this question at considerable length. I had intended to read therefrom, but I will not do so on account of the lack of time.

Shaftesbury, the greatest of England's humane statesmen, uttered anathemas against the men who would not assist him in his war against oppression. In his private diary he wrote:

I had to break every political connection, to encounter a most formidable array of capitalists and mill owners.

Bright was a bitter opponent to the movement. Cobden was hostile, though not as hostile as Bright. Gladstone, even, gave no support to the 10-hour bill. However, in 1864, Gladstone came to the support of the factory acts. England had commenced to see the effect upon the State of stunting the children and working the women long hours in mills and factories. Likewise, cruelty had been practiced toward children and had its effect on public sentiment.

A parliamentary leader, Michael Sadler, member of Parliament, wrote some verses in the great movement for factory legislation, describing one of the whipping scenes. I quote it:

"Father, I'm up, but weary,
I scarce can reach the door,
And long the way and dreary;
Oh, carry me once more!"

Her wasted form seemed nothing;
The load was at his heart,
The sufferer he kept soothing
Till at the mill they part.
The overlooker met her,
As to her frame she crept,
And with his thong he beat her,
And cursed her as she wept.

All night with tortured feeling,
He watched his speechless child,
While, close beside her kneeling,
She knew him not, nor smiled.
Again the factory's ringing
Her last perceptions tried;
When, from her straw bed springing,
"'Tis time!" she shrieked, and died!

For two centuries England had permitted her children to be exploited for private profit. Lord Macaulay once made a prophecy to the English people, which has been fulfilled to the letter:

Your overworked boys will become a feeble and ignoble race of men, the parents of a more feeble progeny; nor will it be long before the deterioration of the laborer will injuriously affect those very industries to which his physical and moral interests have been sacrificed.

The present war up to this time would seem to indicate the fulfillment of Macaulay's prophecy.

This Republic must learn the lesson. How can there be any more important question in its preparation for defense and in its preparation for peace than that there be justice to all its people. Justice is denied the children growing up if they do not have the right of childhood and to become fully developed men and women. It is unjust to all the people of the Nation that its citizens should be destroyed in this manner, for, after all, the real purpose of the Nation is the development of the best in citizenship and in life. Battleships and armies and commerce do not in themselves make a nation. Wealth, prosperity, and industrial life are not sufficient. Men and women, strong, courageous, full of hope, ready to grasp opportunity, high ideals, lives devoted to service, ready to die for principle, are what make great a nation. Dwarfed, stunted, hopeless children can not keep up ideals. What kind of fathers and mothers will they make? As every argument is against war morally, economically, and biologically, so is every argument against child labor from the standpoint of the Nation. It is the duty of Congress to wake up and solve this problem. We pay attention to the development of hogs and cattle and the conservation of forests and streams and water power; why not child conservation? If child labor is necessary to sustain any industry, that industry ought to go down.

The situation, as I have heretofore shown by figures, is markedly better, but the wrong still exists—exists to a marked degree. I shall not take the time to go into circumstances of child labor of the various factory and mining interests of the country, but those who desire to avail themselves of the facts can secure much information in the way of pamphlets issued by the National Child Labor Committee, having an office in New York. The whole matter as to the State, seems to me, can be summed up in a resolution said to have been framed by the great advocate of child-labor laws, Jacob Reis, being a resolution adopted by the Protestant Episcopal Convention of 1904 and readopted by the convention of 1907:

The employment of children in factories depresses wages, destroys homes, and depreciates the human stock. Whatever interferes with the proper education and nurture of the child contradicts the best interests of the Nation. We call, then, on Christian employers and on Christian parents to endeavor after such betterment of the local and general laws as shall make the labor of children impossible in this Christian country.

THE NEED OF A CHILD-LABOR LAW FOR THE CHILD ITSELF.

More important from the standpoint of justice than the effect upon the State of child labor is the effect upon the child itself. The child, brought into the world without its consent, has some indisputable rights; one is the right to grow up and develop and be what God and nature intended the child should be. No one is contending that children should not work in healthful pursuits or be taught along lines to follow in after life. The old saying of the rabbi is true: "He who teaches his son no trade is as one who teaches him theft." The warfare is not against children working out-of-doors or teaching children a trade by which they may earn their living. Everyone believes that work that builds up is good for children—the child's work is a part of his very education—but the warfare is against a very different class of labor; against labor that tears down in the grimy dust and smoke of factories, the endless and dizzy whirl of machinery, the bad air, poor ventilation, that stunts the life of the little ones. It is this labor that the conscience of the American people is against. Shall we deny to children the divine right to grow up to men and women physically, mentally, morally—not to have their childhood coined into dollars; no chance to dream, to play. It would be better for the Nation to turn them out of these factories, pension them if necessary—far cheaper in the end—let them roam the hills, play by the streams, wander in the woods, out where "there are sermons in stones and books in babbling brooks," there in communication with nature learning to be better and happier citizens, no rancor of injustice in their hearts, not growing up to despise industrial relations that close the door of opportunity to them. A happy citizenship is always a better citizenship. The Senator from Massachusetts, in debate a few weeks ago, said:

The body of an innocent child floating dead in the water, the victim of the destruction of an unarmed vessel, is to me a more poignant spectacle than an unsold bale of cotton.

True, indeed. Also is not an emaciated child, dull-eyed, with stunted little body, without hope, discouraged and despondent, a more pitiful spectacle than an unmanufactured bale of cotton? Many of these children are slowly being ground to death in the whirl of factory machinery. They would be better floating dead upon the water—that would be a quick death—instead of the long, weary, poisoned way they travel to the grave.

"THE WAGES OF YOUTH—IS DEATH."

[By Lillian Lauferty, in New York Evening Journal.]

The wages of Sin is Death, we know,
And we pay the price, since this is so;
For we've learned the toll of the road we go.

But the wages of Youth is Death to-day,
And a fearsome price the children pay
For our light and food and ribbons gay.
They spin and delve and hew and sell—
Shy babes and mothers of men as well
Must work in the dark o'er the pit of Hell.

Shall we never face our debt of Greed,
That coins our gold from their sorry need
And makes "Success" its only creed?
Shall we never face our debt of Sin
For the youth and joy there might have been
Had the factory gates not snapped it in?

The wages of Youth is Death to-day.
Shall only the babes and the mothers pay,
As they trudge to doom on their darkened way?

I insert at this point, without stopping to read it, a little poem, by Dr. Henry Van Dyke, on "Child Labor."

The matter referred to is as follows:

CHILD LABOR.

Ah, who are these on whom the vital bloom
Of life has withered to the dust of doom?
These little pilgrims prematurely worn
And bent as if they bore the weight of years?
The childish faces, pallid and forlorn,
Too dull for laughter and too hard for tears?
Is this the ghost of that insane crusade
That led ten thousand children long ago,
A flock of innocents, deceived, betrayed,
Yet pressing on through want and woe
To meet their fate, faithful and unafraid?
Nay, for a million children now
Are marching in the long, pathetic line,
With weary step and early wrinkled brow;
And at their head appears no holy sign
Of hope in heaven;
For unto them is given
No cross to carry, but a cross to drag.
Before their strength is ripe they bear
The load of labor, toiling underground,
In dangerous mines and breathing heavy air
Of crowded shops; their tender lives are bound
To service of the whirling, clattering wheels
That fill the factories with dust and noise;
They are not girls and boys,
But little "hands," who blindly dumbly feed
With their own blood the hungry god of Greed.

Mr. KENYON. I ask to insert a statement of the National Child Labor Committee, which has been published, and which I will not read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

AMERICA AGAINST CHILD-LABOR EVIL.

Over 87,000,000 Americans have said that children under 14 ought not to work in factories. Of the 78,000,000 who live in mining States, 41,000,000 have forbidden children under 16 to work in mines. Forty-five million have on their statute books an eight-hour day for children and 58,000,000 a night-work prohibition for all under 16 years.

How many Americans are willing to go on record as opposing such restrictions? Next Friday they will assemble at Washington for the third hearing on the Palmer-Owen bill, which forbids the shipment in interstate commerce of goods produced in establishments where these four provisions are not applied.

The friends of the bill were heard early in March and a dozen speakers were at that hearing. Miss Jane Addams did not attend the hearing, but she is heartily in favor of the bill. She has summed up her reasons for supporting it: "Because our social and industrial problems are interstate problems, it becomes increasingly obvious that they must be regulated through Federal legislation. Ever since the attempt made years ago by Senator Beveridge I have hoped to see a national child-labor law. Hitherto in our efforts to enforce child-labor laws we have not only inspected the factories, but we have tried to follow the child into the factory from the home and the school. In contrast to this, the method applied in the Palmer-Owen bill now pending in Congress and in all the Federal child-labor bills that have been introduced is to discover the violations of the law by tracing the suspected product. I believe that this will be a comparatively simple process and one particularly well adapted to America, since our business men are more accustomed to dealing with industrial affairs from the material side than from the human."

The child-labor committee of Virginia—that stronghold of States' rights—the executive council of the Massachusetts Board of Trade, and the Los Angeles Chamber of Commerce are among the many organizations in all parts of the country that have indorsed the bill. The National Child Labor Committee is asking its members—particularly those who live in the States with lower standards of legislation—to write to their Representatives at Washington indorsing the bill. Owen R. Lovejoy, general secretary of the committee, said:

"Many of our members are manufacturers and large employers of labor who are earnest advocates of such restrictions upon the employment of children as are provided in the Palmer-Owen bill. We have frequently had cordial cooperation from them in State campaigns, and, taking the country as a whole, I believe that there is little sympathy with those employers who published recently a statement of 'What one State is doing to destroy industry,' and enumerated the common humane provisions of the labor laws, including the 14-year age limit, the regulation of hours of older minors, and the posting provisions that are recognized as necessary for the enforcement of the law. I can not believe that the American people will ever agree that to prohibit child labor would destroy industry. But whether the Federal law will pass at the present session depends largely upon the outspoken support of our friends."—Statement by National Child Labor Committee.

NEED OF A NATIONAL CHILD-LABOR LAW.

Mr. KENYON. I have discussed hurriedly the question of "Why a child-labor law," and I want to say just a word on the question "Why a national child-labor law." As nearly all the States of the Union have adopted child-labor laws, the question naturally arises, "What is the use of a national law?"

State child-labor laws are not as well enforced as a national law would be. There should be a uniform standard. Some of the States permit child labor over 14, others over 16, some over 12. It is perfectly apparent that it tends to bring about a condition of unfair competition, where the manufacturer of one State may employ children over 12 or 14, and in another adjoining State can not employ them under 16. Likewise the different States in their laws differ as to night work, differ as to the method of proving age, as to the certificates for employment. Systems of inspection are different. One State is interested in the children of another State. It is not merely a State problem, and laws are better enforced in Federal courts than in State courts. It is a national problem. There children are growing up to be citizens of the Nation as well as the State.

When Sumner was told that slavery was sectional, he replied, "That while slavery might be sectional, freedom was national"; and the freedom of children, to work out their destiny, is a national problem. Senator Beveridge, in his speech in the Senate some years ago, said: "Childhood labor in any State lowers manhood labor in every State." Childhood labor in some States means bayonets at Lawrence, Mass. Child labor in one State may mean a strike in another State for a living wage. Child labor is a national sore and requires a national surgical operation.

I ask, Mr. President, to insert at this point a digest of the child-labor laws of all the States of the Union.

Mr. KENYON. It is a startling thing that the invention of machinery to lessen the cost of production has been the chief instrumentality in the enslavement of children. It is somewhat of a coincidence that one of the great laborers for the children in Great Britain was Robert Owen. He tells us in his autobiography that "children were received as early as 6 years, the pauper authorities declining to send them at any later age." These little children worked from 6 in the morning until 7 in the evening, and after that they were supposed to be educated.

A century later the bill for the emancipation of children in this country is fathered by a Senator of the same name as Robert Owen, who performed a mighty work in England to improve the lot of the child slaves.

The question of child labor is involved in an adequate wage for the head of the family, enough wage to pay for decent shelter, raiment, and food. Child labor is no more the result of poverty than poverty is the result of child labor. Statistics do not entirely show it, because, as has been said, "you can not put tired eyes, pallid cheeks, and languid little limbs into statistics."

Industrialism must cease exploiting the play land of childhood. Dr. Stephen S. Wise, Jewish rabbi, of New York, said in an address at Faneuil Hall, "Science may cry, save the child for the sake of the future; religion, for the sake of God; education, for the sake of the people; democracy, for the sake of the State; industry, for the sake of efficiency; conscience cries, save the child for its own sake."

Of course poverty can not be eradicated in this Nation; conditions, however, can be better. Why do men want to achieve by denying others the rights which justice should accord them? It has always been true, and always shall be, that the strong must bear the burdens of the weak. Those of property in the land must help to educate the children of those who have not. How much better to put the children in schools instead of mines and factories. We are proud as a Nation of our system of schools. They are the great melting pots. Out of them come broad national spirit, a love of country, and devotion to those institutions we prize. The children of the Republic should have the opportunity of attending schools—every child who desires—and the Nation must provide the means, if necessary, for the children so to do.

One of the most interesting books with relation to child labor I want to quote a little from, but I shall read only one quotation. It is Spargo's book on the Bitter Cry of the Children. One little incident I want to read:

In a New York kindergarten one winter's morning a frail, dark-eyed girl stood by the radiator warming her tiny blue and benumbed hands. She was poorly and scantily clad, and her wan, pinched face was unutterably sad with the sadness that shadows the children of poverty and comes from cares which only maturer years should know. When she had warmed her little hands back to life again the child looked wistfully up into the teacher's face and asked:

"Teacher, do you love God?"

"Why, yes, dearie; of course I love God," answered the wondering teacher.

"Well, I don't; I hate him," was the fierce rejoinder. "He makes the wind blow, and I haven't any warm clothes. He makes it snow, and my shoes have holes in them. He makes it cold, and we haven't any fire at home. He makes us hungry, and mamma hadn't any bread for our breakfast. Oh, I hate him."

True are the words of Ella Wheeler Wilcox:

In this boasted land of freedom there are bonded baby slaves,
And the busy world goes by and does not heed.
They are driven to the mill, just to glut and overfill
Bursting coffers of the mighty monarch, Greed.
When they perish we are told it is God's will.
Oh, the roaring of the mill, of the mill.

Spargo says on page 146:

If all the people of this great Republic could see little Anetta Fachini, 4 years old, working with her mother making artificial flowers, as I saw her in her squalid tenement home at 11 o'clock at night, I think the impression upon their hearts and minds would be far deeper and more lasting than any that whole pages of figures could make. The frail little thing was winding green paper around wires to make stems for artificial flowers to decorate ladies' hats. Every few minutes her head would droop and her weary eyelids close, but her little fingers still kept moving, uselessly, helplessly, mechanically moving. Then the mother would shake her gently, saying: "Sleep not, Anetta. Only a few more, only a few more." And the little eyes would open slowly and the tired fingers once more move with intelligent direction and purpose.

Some one has told of the march of Mother Jones, with her little army of child toilers, to Oyster Bay in order that the President might see for himself some of the children employed in the mills. Among this army there were children from 8 to 11 years of age—some of them 11 years old who had worked two years. All these children are asking and all the friends of this legislation are asking is merely a chance for the children to have their childhood.

About a year ago Life presented a startling picture: Poor, emaciated children, ill-clad, illy fed, sadness written into their countenance, marching up to the President of the United States and imploring him for legislation which would merely give them a chance to grow up.

Another picture in one of our papers greatly impressed me: A long line of children going to the factory just at dawn, pails in their hands, sleepy eyes, laggard footsteps, a great line of tired children, and the smoke of the factory, by the skill of the artist, had been woven into a flag which floated over the top of the picture, and underneath was marked the words, "By the dawn's early light." Such scenes are common in this country, but such scenes ought to be impossible.

IT IS ONLY THE CHILDREN GOING TO WORK.

[By Hudson Maxim.]

A whir of dust is sweeping the hill
Between the gray dawn and the huge black mill;
There's a drift of rags and of skinny bones,
With skeleton feet on the ruthless stones.
What specters are these in the witching light—
This ghostly rear guard of the night,
Wearily treading the trail of the dark,
Arousing the morn before the lark?
What wights are they, so gaunt and lean,
With lagging face and drowsy mien,
Who under the dim lamp's flickering glow
Wind into the cavernous mill below?
A sortie of ghouls aloose from the tomb,
Or a rabble of wraiths begot of the gloom?
No—goblins and ghouls such task would shirk—
It is only the children going to work!

I went into a cotton mill in the South some years ago with a friend who is a stockholder in the company. Little children were working there; the room seemed full of fragments that you could not help swallowing. Knowing my views on this subject, as we came out he was in an apologetic frame of mind and said: "I have never been in that mill before. I shall not be very happy when I get my dividends on the stock. I do not like to see those children working there."

In another place Spargo says:

In the bituminous mines of West Virginia boys of 9 or 10 are frequently employed. I met one little fellow 10 years old in Mount Carbon, W. Va., last year, who was employed as a "trap boy."

Think of what it means to be a trap boy at 10 years of age. It means to sit alone in a dark mine passage hour after hour, with no human soul near; to see no living creature except the mules as they pass with their loads, or a rat or two seeking to share one's meal; to stand in water or mud that covers the ankles, chilled to the marrow by the cold draughts that rush in when you open the trapdoor for the mules to pass through; to work for 14 hours—waiting, opening and shutting a door, then waiting again—for 60 cents; to reach the surface when all is wrapped in the mantle of night and to fall to the earth exhausted and have to be carried away to the nearest "shack" to be revived before it is possible to walk to the farther shack called home.

A factory inspector of Illinois some years ago found a child 4 years old who earned 19 cents in an afternoon stringing beads.

In the wonderful book of Spargo he closed with these inspiring words, page 269:

Some there are, the despised builders of humanity's temples, who are laboring to give this vast heritage to the children of all the world. They build patiently, for they have faith in their work.

And this is their faith: That the power of the world springs from the common labor and strife and conquest of the countless ages of human life and struggle; that not for a few was that labor and that struggle, but for all. And the common labor of the race for the common good and the common joy will give blossoms, and babies the fullness of life which sordid greed with its blight makes impossible.

Can not Congress be of the faith of the builders?

I insert, without objection, a statement issued by the Executive Council of the American Federation of Labor entitled "Boycott Child Labor Out of Existence," without stopping to read it.

The matter referred to is as follows:

BOYCOTT CHILD LABOR OUT OF EXISTENCE.

No dividends, no profits can compensate for the waste and the wrong of child labor. The greatest thing that any nation has is its men and its women. No nation can be greater than the masses of its men and women. There is no more deadly certain way to undermine national power than to deny its children rights necessary to most complete development of heart, mind, and body.

Child labor denies these opportunities, not only to the individuals themselves, but to their children and their children's children. The effect of the wrong and waste is cumulative, sapping the life force of the nation.

Many industries in our country are soulless corporations as heartless as the "ogres" that were said to eat children. They have taken these little ones and have done their most to them. They have set dreary, tiresome tasks for little hands, they have permitted little feet to tread in dangerous places—all that they might have higher profits.

Statistics of child labor, however appalling, are a most inadequate method of evaluating the incalculable—the effect of child labor upon human minds, bodies, and ideals. Child labor robs children of a chance to grow, a chance to learn, and a chance to dream. It robs them of the chance to attain the fullest development of manhood and womanhood. It leaves them with a sense of the world's injustice burned into their inmost beings.

Children will become better citizens when the wrong of child labor is abolished. They will become healthier, more capable men and women when uninjured by premature overwork. They will become greater men and women when removed from associations that degrade and injure.

Child labor is not essential to any industry. An industry which can not be profitably conducted without using child labor is not necessary to society and is abhorrent to the social conscience. Men and women with hearts do not wish to encourage or to indorse in any degree those who profit by child labor. But often they are placed in the unfair position of giving seeming approval through patronage because they do not have access to information that will enable them to act in accordance with their sense of justice and their conviction of right.

It is due to those who earnestly desire the welfare of the nation's children that they should have the opportunity to help in the conservation and protection of the children.

It is a most solemn obligation due the children that all organizations for human welfare should use every available agency to promote humanity's progress.

Therefore, we, the executive council of the American Federation of Labor, as authorized representatives of the greatest humanitarian movement of the country, declare that any who profits by the toil of children at all or by the labor of other minors required to toil more than eight hours a day, is unfair and unworthy of the patronage of true patriots and those who desire human welfare.

Declaration adopted by the executive council of the American Federation of Labor, Washington, D. C., May 13, 1914.

Mr. KENYON. I also ask permission to insert the child-labor laws of a number of foreign countries.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Iowa? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

AUSTRIA.

EMPLOYMENTS PROHIBITED.

Under 12: In any industrial establishment.

Under 14: Regularly in factories, mines below ground, or industries detrimental to child's health or physical development or interfering with legal school requirements.

Under 18: In lead smelters, at certain operations producing lead poisoning.

The ministers of commerce and interior may interpret and amplify these provisions, also designate those industries in which young persons may not work at all or only under certain conditions.

HOURS OF LABOR.

The maximum working day, without distinction of age, consists of 11 hours. Young persons between 12 and 14 shall not work more than 8 hours, and boys over 14 may be employed in mines in shifts of 12 hours.

The ministers are allowed to make exceptions to this rule in case of need.

REST PERIODS.

If not more than five hours are worked before or after the midday rest, the rest period (one-fourth hour each) in these periods of employment may be omitted, but not the midday rest of one hour. Rest periods amounting to one and one-half hours, including a midday rest of one hour, have also been established for railway building and construction work undertaken by railways. Young persons employed in the mining industry must be allowed a rest period after four hours' work; the total duration of their rest periods must be longer by one hour than those allowed to adults, and they must not be employed in any other manner during such rest periods.

There are a large number of exceptions from this legal regulation.

NIGHT WORK.

Young persons under 16 are prohibited from working between 8 p. m. and 5 a. m., but the ministers are given power to make certain exceptions, and the exemptions to this provision are quite numerous. Young persons between 14 and 16, under a regular system of alternate shifts, may be employed at unlimited night work in glass industry, iron and steel works, in scythe-blade factories assisting workmen at the fires, or in paper and pulp manufacture, in enamel-ware factories from 8 p. m. to 9 p. m., in mines until 11 p. m., in white-bread bakeries as apprentices at the table four hours. Limited night work in silk mills, etc.

ADMINISTRATION.

The general control of the administration of the law is divided between the minister of commerce, concerning industrial workers, and the minister of public works, concerning mines and smelting works. The industrial inspection service in the ministry of commerce is, unlike that of Germany, highly centralized. Inspectors are appointed by the minister and are under the immediate direction and control of a central inspector who is the industrial expert of the ministry and advises the minister in cases of appeal from decision of inferior officers.

BELGIUM.

EMPLOYMENTS PROHIBITED.

Under 14: In mines, pits, quarries, on building operations; in works, mills, factories, workshops, hotels, public houses, offices of industrial and commercial undertakings; in establishments which are classed as dangerous, unhealthy, or noxious, and in which work is carried on by means of steam boilers or mechanical power; in ports, on quays, or in railway stations or in connection with transport by water or land. The law applies to both public and private undertakings, even when they serve the purposes of trade training or of a benevolent institution, except to work carried on in undertakings in which only members of the family are employed under the supervision of the father, mother, or guardian, provided that such work is not classed as dangerous, unhealthy, or noxious and that no steam boilers or mechanical power are used. But children of 13 holding a leave certificate issued according to act relating to school attendance may be employed, and the King may, until the establishment of the fourth grade, but not after January 1, 1920, sanction the employment of children between 12 and 14 for a certain number of hours a day, certain number of days, and under certain conditions, taking into consideration the claims of elementary and technical instruction, nature of the occupation, and requirements of the particular industry, occupation, or trade.

Under 16 and females between 16 and 21: The King may prohibit the employment of any work exceeding their strength or liable to prove dangerous to them or unhealthy, or allow the same at certain hours, days, or under certain conditions. Royal decree of December 26, 1892, prohibits employment in 46 especially dangerous industries.

HOURS OF LABOR.

Children under 16 and females between 16 and 21 not to work more than 12 hours a day.

The King may regulate the hours of work for children under 16 and females between 16 and 21 for certain employments and according to the requirements of the particular industries, occupations, and trades.

By royal decrees issued before the outbreak of the European war the 12-hour maximum working day for young persons was reduced in a number of industries to 8 hours in type foundries, 8 and 10 hours in the building trades (8 hours, November to February; 10 hours, March to October); 9 and 10 hours in the furniture industry and in auxiliary building trades (9 hours, October to March; 10 hours, April to September); 10 hours in stone quarries in the open air, in the newspaper-printing trade, in art trade, in paper factories, in tobacco and cigar factories, in the pottery and terracotta industry, in the manufacture of looking-glasses, in zinc rolling mills, in the manufacture of tools and metal, domestic utensils (10 hours for workers of 12 to 14 years of age, 11 hours other protected workers), in bell foundries, braziers' works and arms factories, in subsidiary clothing trades, in tanneries, in shoemaking, harness making, leather work, the manufacture of hats, lingerie, buttons, gloves, umbrellas and canes, dyeing, and the manufacture of articles of fashion; 10 hours and 20 minutes in crystal glass factories; 10½ hours in mines and pits in the coal mines of Mariemont for male young persons of 14 to 16 years of age (10 hours for transportation work below ground; 9 hours for female young persons of 16 to 21 years of age above ground), in coke ovens and briquette factories, in tool-repair shops attached to stone quarries (10 hours in other shops of this kind), in large-scale establishments of the iron and steel industry, in sugar factories, in the manufacture of matches, in the plate-glass factories; 11 hours in fish canneries, in specified subsidiary clothing trades—knitting, passementerie making, lace making, embroidery making, in large-scale machine factories, in the linen, hemp, and jute industry; 11½ hours in the woolen-goods industry; 11½ hours (66 hours per week) in the cotton industry.

It will be seen from the above that in nearly all industries a 10 or 10½-hour maximum working-day has been substituted for the 12-hour working-day, except in textile industries and machine construction.

REST PERIODS.

One and one-half hours rest periods must be allowed during working time of 12 hours. By royal decree the rest periods for particular employments may be regulated for children under 16 and females between 16 and 21, and before the establishment of the German civil government royal decrees had changed the system of 1½ hours rest periods for some industries. In the case of young persons employed in the crystal and hollow-glass industry, whose total hours of labor are 10 hours and 20 minutes, two rest periods of 20 minutes each must be allowed in the morning and afternoon and one of half an hour at midday. The total duration of rest periods amounts altogether to 1 hour in the leather, felt, underclothing industry and other branches of the clothing industry (working day, 10 hours), in the machine industry (working day, 11 hours), to one-eighth of the working time in the mining industry below ground when interruptions occur caused by the nature of the work. In the match industry the workers must leave the workrooms during the rest periods. In the spinning and weaving industries the machines must be stopped during rest periods, and in the machine industries and a few other industries the workers must be allowed to leave the premises.

NIGHT WORK.

Children under 16 and females regardless of age shall not work between 9 p. m. and 5 a. m. By royal decree boys over 14 and females may be employed between 9 p. m. and 5 a. m. at work necessitating such employment, and boys in mines at certain classes of work, and the governors may permit night work for boys over 14 for all trades and industries on account of urgent necessity. The exceptions allowed by royal decree before the outbreak of the war were quite numerous. Complete night work after cessation of work due to urgent necessity or in exceptional circumstances. Work may be performed in fish-preserving factories by boys 14 to 16 and girls 16 to 21 between 9 and 12 p. m. 30 days in the year. The total period must not exceed 12 hours and must be interrupted by three rest periods of altogether 1½ hours. Night shift 9 p. m. to 5 a. m. for children 14 to 16 allowed in the manufacture of crystal glass, night shift not exceeding 10½ hours; in the manufacture of plate glass no night work, except in the smelting process; in blast furnaces, iron, steel, etc., works, foundries, etc., shift 10½ hours; paper factories, night shift, 10 hours, including three rest periods of a total of 1½ hours; in sugar and beet-sugar factories, in enamelware factories during one week in every fortnight, 11 hours, rest periods 1½ hours; in coal mines below ground (to 4 a. m. for children 12 to 13), night shift 9 hours as crutters, road men, and in gathering up mine timber; rest periods, one-eighth of the period of employment on the surface of mines in night work for children; at coke ovens and in recovery of by-products of 11½ hours, rest periods, of which principal rest must be of 1 hour's duration.

ADMINISTRATION.

The execution of the law shall be supervised by special officials appointed by the Government, without prejudice to the duties incumbent on the regular police authorities. The general administration of all the labor laws as exercised before the establishment of the German civil government is centered in the office of labor (office du travail), which is at present a part of the ministry of industry and labor (ministère de l'industrie et du travail), and is divided into two main sections: (1) The central administration and (2) the provincial service. The central administration consists of (a) the central administrative authorities, (b) the medical factory inspectors, and (c) the female inspectors. So far as the labor laws relate to industrial and commercial establishments, they are enforced by that factory-inspection department, and so far as they relate to mines, quarries, and metallurgical establishments the enforcement is in the hands of the mining engineers and their assistant delegate inspectors. In relation to the laws concerning labor of young persons and children the inspectors must ratify the ages of the children and note the conditions under which they work. These laws apply not only to factories, shops, and classified establishments but also to transportation agencies on land and water, ports, stations, etc., and to all public and private establishments, as well as those having professional or philanthropic establishments. The enforcement by the inspectors, however, does not apply to establishmetns in which only the members of the family are employed under the authority of the father and mother, provided such establishments are not classed as dangerous, unhealthy, or unsuitable and the work is not done by the aid of steam power or mechanical motors.

Children between 16 and 18 may be employed 120 days in the year in urgent work in the repairing of ships and power machines.

ADMINISTRATION.

Labor and factory inspection is under the jurisdiction of the ministry of labor and social welfare. The director of labor, under this ministry, has charge of the inspection of mines and quarries as well as of industrial inspection. Although the bureau of inspectional service has a chief, who receives all the reports from the division inspectors, the department of labor inspection can not be said to have a centralized form of organization. Each of the 11 division inspectors is the real head of his territory and has sole executive power over the departmental inspectors in his district. Uniformity of applications of the laws is insured by the Consell Supérieur du Travail, assisted by the annual conferences of the division inspectors.

GERMANY.

EMPLOYMENTS PROHIBITED.

The law distinguishes between one's own and others' children.

Others' children.

Under 12: In workshops, commercial, transportation, and building enterprises, preparation of paints, occupations in cellars, hotels, restaurants, taverns, delivery of goods, or as messengers.

Under 13, and even at a later age if an educational certificate has not been obtained: In factories, mines, and quarries, surface and underground, enumerated workshops, salt works, brick works, stone breaking, chimney sweeping, street cleaning, tobacco industry, cleaning boilers, or in all establishments where mechanical power is used.

Under 14: In street trading and peddling, iron and steel rolling mills, hammer works, or in public theatrical exhibitions or other public performances.

Under 16, and females: At certain enumerated employments, in quarries, chicory industry, junk and rag sorting, sugar refineries, Dinas and chamette fire-brick works, in connection with chromate, lead, and glass works, in mines, unless a physician's certificate has been obtained, or in physically exhausting work, or in excessively hot work places.

Under 18: At certain enumerated employments in connection with grinding of Thomas slag metal or in occupations endangering health or detrimental to morals.

One's own children.

Under 10: In any employment except delivering goods or other errands.

Under 12: In workshops where elementary or mechanical power is used, in hotels, taverns, or restaurants.

For later ages.

Same provisions apply as for others' children.

The foregoing regulations may be amplified by orders from the Federal council, by State legislation, and police regulations.

HOURS OF LABOR.

Child under 14 not to work more than 6 hours in 24. During school period only 3 hours. Maximum working day for young persons between 14 and 16, 10 hours a day, or 60 hours per week; girls, 58 hours per week; exceptions in cases of urgent necessity.

REST PERIODS.

Rest periods of 2 hours for those young persons only who are employed for 10 hours. One hour's rest is prescribed for midday and two rest periods each of one-half hour for forenoon and afternoon. A midday rest of 1 hour is all that is required in the case of 8-hour shifts, provided that work is not performed for more than 4 hours before the rest period. Half an hour only is required for young persons who are employed during 6 hours. Exceptions necessitated by accidents or uncontrollable events in view of the nature of the work are provided for; and the Federal council has the right to permit general exceptions for particular industries.

Rest periods may by special request be regulated differently by the higher administrative authorities or the Imperial Chancellor; the workmen, however, or the workmen's committee must previously be given an opportunity to express their views concerning such regulation.

The federal council has made use of the authority conferred upon it by article 139a as regards the glass industry and large-scale establishments of the iron industry, and has abrogated the prohibition of night work for male young persons.

Rest periods are regulated in these two industries as follows:

1. In the glass industry the 10-hour maximum working day must be interrupted by rest periods amounting altogether to 1 hour. Interruptions of less than 15 minutes duration are not taken into consideration. But the higher administrative authorities may allow exceptions, if it is shown that the work is not very tiring and that a number of interruptions occur which give sufficient rest.

2. In large-scale establishments of the iron industry, rest periods amounting to not less than 2 hours must be allowed in every shift lasting longer than 8 hours. Interruptions in work of less than 15 minutes duration are not counted as rest periods. The rest periods may, however, be reduced to 1 hour in the case of shifts of less than 11 hours.

NIGHT WORK.

Night work prohibited for children under 12 between 8 p. m. and 8 a. m. Male young persons between 14 and 16 not to work between 8 p. m. and 6 a. m., and females of this age not after 5 p. m. on Saturdays and days before holidays.

ADMINISTRATION.

The Industrial Code is based upon imperial legislation, and therefore the general law for the protection of workers are uniform throughout the States of the German Empire. The administration of the labor laws, however, is a matter of State control, each State having the sole jurisdiction over the administration and the regulation of industrial inspection within its boundaries. Within each State the King or head of the State has the appointive power of State councilors, and the ministry of interior or of commerce and industry has the jurisdiction over the factory-inspection department in the State. There is therefore no uniformity in the organization of the administrative functions of factory inspection, each State having the form of organization which seems best suitable for its purposes. The imperial supervision over the administrative organizations of each State is very slight. The budget of the factory-inspection department of each State is a matter of State control; the reports of the inspectors are directed to the minister of the interior, to the minister of state, or to the minister of commerce and industry. The federal council (Bundesrat) may issue special rules and regulations for all the States, but does not interfere in the administrative functions of the factory departments of the States. In Prussia the organization is based upon a territorial district division, and is entirely decentralized in that there is practically no organized union of all the district inspectors nor any supreme head or director of the whole factory-inspection force. On the other hand, in Baden we find a highly centralized form of organization with a responsible director at the head of the department, with a general functional assignment of most of the inspectors, although there is also a territorial subdivision. Between these two extremes of the forms of organization there are a number of States like Saxony, Bavaria, Wurttemberg, and others where the form of organization in some respects approaches that of Baden, while in others it is similar to that of Prussia.

Prussia: At the head of the factory-inspection department in Prussia is the ministry of commerce and industry, which issues the special rules and regulations for the administrative guidance of the inspectors, passes upon the qualifications and examinations of the inspectors and appoints all the industrial inspectors and their assistants. The State is divided for administration purposes into government circuits, which correspond to the jurisdiction of the police and other government authorities.

Baden: The inspectorial organization of Baden is strictly centralized, with one chief who has the title of superior state councilor (Ober Regierungsrat) and is the director of the whole factory-inspection department in Baden. The inspectors work in conjunction with the police.

HOURS OF LABOR.

Maximum working-day for young persons under 18, 10½ hours a day and 7½ hours on Saturdays. In textile factories, 10 hours a day, or 55½ hours a week, and from 6 or 7 a. m. to 6 or 7 p. m., respectively; and in other factories the same hours or from 8 a. m. to 8 p. m. In domestic workshops to work only between 6 a. m. and 9 p. m. ordinary days; from 6 a. m. to 4 p. m. on Saturdays. Children under 14 attending school shall not work more than 20 hours a week, and on school days not more than 3½ hours, nor between 8.30 p. m. and 6 a. m.; when school is closed not more than 8 hours a day, nor between 9 p. m. and 6.30 a. m. Boy under 16 shall not exercise street trading between 9 p. m. and 6 a. m.

REST PERIODS.

Within an equal working-day (6 to 6, 7 to 7, also 8 to 8 o'clock in nontextile factories and workshops) rest periods, amounting to altogether 2 hours must be allowed on full workdays in textile factories and workshops, and rest periods amounting to altogether 1½ hours must be allowed in nontextile factories. In both cases 1 hour must be allowed before 3 o'clock in the afternoon, and a rest period of half an hour must be allowed on Saturdays. On the other hand, a rest period of at least half an hour must be allowed after every 4½ hours in textile factories and workshops, and after every 5 hours in nontextile factories and workshops. The latter rest periods are also prescribed in print works, bleaching and dyeing works, which are otherwise treated as textile factories and workshops. There are exceptions and modifications to the foregoing regulations applying to nontextile factories and workshops.

NIGHT WORK.

No night work for children under 18.

Exceptions: On account of unavoidable circumstances, an extended period of employment from 6 a. m. to 7 p. m. is allowed in certain factories; in establishments engaged in the process of preserving fish or fruit night work may be allowed. Night work of children between 14 and 18 is allowed in the manufacture of plate glass; total hours of labor must not exceed 60 hours per week; rest period of one-half hour must be allowed after 5 hours' working in tin and lead rolling mills, night shifts 12 or 8 hours; rest periods 1½ hours, number of night shifts 7 in 2 weeks, at blast furnaces, and 6 shifts in other establishments; same provision for paper factories. Night work for children above 16 in those departments of sugar refineries in which the knocking out and cutting of loaf sugar is performed; in book and newspaper printing establishments children 14 to 18 authorized to do night work, shift 12 hours, including rest periods of altogether 1½ hours, not more than 6 night shifts in a fortnight. England is the only state allowing children 16 to 18 to do night work with a maximum working-day of 12 hours in 24 hours in newspaper-printing offices in which the printing is done only twice during the week. Lace factories may employ children 16 to 18 between 4 a. m. and 10 p. m.; boys over 14 may be employed in a mine below ground at night; on the surface of mines the employment of boys under 16 is prohibited between the hours of 9 p. m. and 5 a. m.; children between 16 and 18 may be employed in the part of a bake house in which the process of baking bread is carried on between 5 a. m. and 9 p. m., including 7 hours' rest. Night work is allowed to persons 16 to 18 in any class of nontextile factories and workshops, provided that employment will not injure their health and it is necessary by reason of the nature of the operations.

ADMINISTRATION.

The administration of the laws for the protection of children is divided. The general control of the administration of the factory, workshop, and mines acts is in the hands of the secretary of state for the home department, who has power to make orders not laid before Parliament and special orders to be laid before Parliament on a variety of subjects in pursuance of the acts, either imposing additional regulations or allowing occupiers special powers or exemptions, and applying either in general or to specified kinds of work places. He may further issue regulations for dangerous trades. Thus the secretary for the home office has very wide powers under the acts, and these powers are freely used. Factory and mine inspectors are appointed by the home office and see to the enforcement of the laws. While the central authorities are responsible for the execution of the laws concerning children working in factories, workshops, and mines, by the employment of children act, relating to children employed in other occupations and trades, it is left to the local authorities to make by-laws, subject to confirmation by the secretary of state, to supplement and amplify the provisions of the act. Thus the local authorities alone are directly responsible for the execution of the enactments. These local laws vary considerably, and do not contribute to effective administration. The county, town, or urban district council make the by-laws, and the enforcement is in the hands of public-control committee, watch committee, police or school-attendance committee.

A war measure allows the temporary suspension of the prohibition of night work for women and children in cases where it is necessary in regard to work to be carried out directly on behalf of the State or to other indispensable requirements of public interests, or in the event of happening beyond the control of human power.

ADMINISTRATION.

Under the direction of the minister of agriculture, industry, and commerce the labor office is intrusted with the enforcement of the law. Divisional and regional inspectors of industry, mining engineers and assistants, and the officers of the judicial police visit the establishments and see to the proper execution of the law. The organization is very similar to the French system.

Under 10: In any industrial establishment. Children over 9 able to read and to write may be admitted to work.

Under 16: In mines, quarries, underground work, cleaning machinery while in motion, in the glass and crystal industry, in establishments at enumerated work dangerous to life and injurious to health.

HOURS OF LABOR.

Children under 14 not to work more than 6 hours a day in any industrial establishment nor more than 8 hours a day in any commercial undertaking.

General working day consists of 11 hours.

REST PERIODS.

One hour rest periods during the working time.

NIGHT WORK.

Children under 14 are forbidden to work at night between 7 p. m. and 5 a. m. Young persons under 18 may work 48 hours a week in night shifts. Self-governing boards (juntas de reformas sociales) have the power to subject particular industries to a prohibition of night work of young persons under 18.

ADMINISTRATION.

The Spanish system of centralization is unique. The institute of social reform at the ministry of the interior acts as central inspectorial authority. Regional inspectors supervise the work of the district inspector and their assistants (ayudantes o auxiliares). They are assisted by autonomous boards appointed in every industrial municipality for a term of 4 years, and consisting of not more than 6 workmen and an equal number of employers, the priest and medical officer under the presidency of the mayor (alcade). A committee appointed by these so-called local committees for social reform (junta provincial de reformas sociales) is to sit at the capital of the province under the presidency of the governor of the province and act in a consultative capacity.

SWEDEN.

EMPLOYMENTS PROHIBITED.

Under 12: No employment.

Boy under 13 and girl under 14: At industrial work carried on in a workshop on certain specified scale, unless complying with educational and physical requirements.

Under 15: At underground work, in mine or quarry.

Under 18: At any employment involving risk of accident or of overexertion or of any other injurious effect on the minor's health or physical development or of imperiling the morals of the minor.

HOURS OF LABOR.

The legal maximum working day consists of 10 hours, or 60 hours a week, except for children under 13, who may not work more than 6 hours a day, or 36 hours hours a week, and under 14 more than 8 hours a day, or 48 a week.

REST PERIODS.

Sweden is the only State which leaves it to the employers to allow rest periods as they please. The law provides that the 10-hour working day of young persons under 18 shall be interrupted by "suitable rest periods," but does not regulate the rest periods.

NIGHT WORK.

Young persons under 18 shall not be employed at night between 7 p. m. and 6 a. m. Exceptions: Children over 16 may work in night shifts not exceeding 8 hours in mines, iron and steel works, rolling mills, blast furnaces, factories and other establishments with continuous fires, sawmills and establishments annexed to them. Young persons must not, however, be employed for two consecutive nights, and 8 hours' rest must be allowed between the two shifts. But they may be employed at night continuously every third week in establishments working on the three-shift system.

ADMINISTRATION.

The supervision of the observance of the law and the directions given by virtue of its authority shall be undertaken under the superintendence and direction of the chief factory inspection authority by special inspection officers, viz, factory inspectors, inspectors of mines, subinspectors, and communal inspection authorities.

SWITZERLAND.

EMPLOYMENTS PROHIBITED.

Under 14 or subject to compulsory school attendance: In factories, workshops, industrial undertakings where several workers are employed.

Under 16: In establishments where normal hours of labor are exceeded, at all work in chemical factories at which poisonous substances are used or gases and fumes are generated, or at dangerous machinery. The Federal Council may further designate occupations at which young persons under 16 may not be employed.

HOURS OF LABOR.

The working day is 10 hours, 9 hours on Saturday and on days before holidays. Restrictions apply to all employees, irrespective of sex or age, and may not be evaded by giving out work to be done at home or by doing voluntary work in the factories after the prescribed hours. Children under 16 still attending to their religious instructions and schooling, the daily hours of such attendance, together with their hours of labor in the factory, must not exceed the prescribed maximum of 10 hours.

REST PERIODS.

One-hour rest periods during the working day.

NIGHT WORK.

No night work for children under 18. In exceptional cases the Federal Council may authorize the night work of children between 14 and 18 in establishments with continuous operation and with a system of alternate shifts, if the work of young persons is considered to be indispensable, and in particular when it appears to be necessary to give them a thorough training. Night shifts must not exceed 10 hours and must be followed by an unbroken rest period of at least 11 hours, including the hours 10 p. m. and 5 a. m.

ADMINISTRATION.

The immediate administration of the law is decentralized and rests with the cantonal governments, but is subject to general supervision by the Federal Council and the Federal board of inspectors. The Federal Council may appoint functional inspectors for special industries or kinds of inspection. There is created an advisory council, consisting of specialists and of representatives of the employers and employees, in equal number, to advise the Federal Council in the drafting of rules and regulations for the enforcement of the law.

Mr. KENYON. Before I take up the question of the constitutionality of a national child-labor law, which is the debatable proposition, I want to call the attention of the Senate to the forces opposing this bill. Mr. President, this is not a sectional question. I do not know why it is that when a child-labor law is mentioned there are a few manufacturers from one or two States of the Union who immediately seem to think that it is an assault upon their industries. I do not think the three or four manufacturers who appeared before the committee seeking to speak for the South really represented the sentiment of the South at all. They were much like the three tailors of Tooley Street who met and resolved, "We, the people of England."

There were placed in the record of the committee clippings from a large number of southern papers favoring this bill. I want to see this bill lifted above sectionalism. I know there is no one in this Chamber who deplores sectionalism more than I do. I have an affection for the people of the South. I would be the last one ever to say a word in criticism of them or any of their industries. I have known too well, in times of trouble, the kindness and great-heartedness of the southern people. I want to put in the RECORD a list of some of the papers in the South which have supported and are supporting this measure. I have resolutions here, which I will not take the time to read, from farmers' associations in the South; but I am going to call attention to the Progressive Farmer, published in Raleigh, N. C., of a late date—February 19. In advising the Members of Congress what bills they should support, it says:

Since southern manufacturers, with their vast wealth and influence, have used their power to prevent suitable child-labor legislation by State action, nothing remains but for the National Government to handle this matter.

That, I understand, is one of the strong farm papers of the South.

In the House of Representatives, out of 150 Members from Southern States, there were only 45 votes against this bill. There were nine southern delegations that voted solidly for it—Maryland, West Virginia, Kentucky, Arkansas, Oklahoma, Arizona, Missouri, New Mexico, and Louisiana—if my information is not in error.

So while I hold no brief to speak for the southern section of this country I think I could produce sufficient evidence on the issue to an unprejudiced jury that the people of the South are not against the bill.

But, Mr. President, there are forces against the bill that I want to call attention to. I am not criticizing the manufacturers who came before the committee from the South and gave their testimony. They were perfectly honest and sincere, I think, about it, and believe that in certain mills down there—and it is doubtless true—that the children working in those mills may be better off than up in the farming mountainous country, and it may be true that some of those mills have good sanitary conditions and are probably not unhealthy.

There is another force in this country, though, that is working against this bill, and that is an organization—I perhaps ought not to say it of the entire organization—but the part of the organization that is working against it has a good deal of nerve to come into the committee rooms of Congress and fight legislation in view of past legislative history. I do not believe the representation of that organization here speaks for the entire organization.

There was an investigation some time ago of lobbying, and I have some three volumes of the evidence here. I think there are some 10 or 12 more volumes. A system of attempted corruption in legislation was unearthed by that committee under the able chairmanship of the distinguished Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN], and we see now before the Interstate Commerce Committee the chief argument against this bill made by the counsel of that institution, the National Association of Manufacturers or the National Council of Industrial Defense, one the child of the other.

Mr. Emery, who made the constitutional argument of many hours, said he represented, as I remember, the testimony of 4,000 manufacturers; but when pinned down in the evidence it was apparent that he represented 26 directors, and it never had been submitted to this general association. But Senators who are receiving the pamphlet now being sent out against this bill, signed by Mr. Emery, counsel of the National Council for Industrial Defense, and Mr. Kirby, as chairman, had better take up the investigation of the lobby and find out the relationship of this gentleman to what has gone on in the past here.

Before I get into that, I am going to read only a few of the letters I have here which I think are rather interesting. When the question came up in the House involving this same constitutional proposition years ago it was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, of which Judge Jenkins, of Wisconsin, was the chairman. It was not the identical question, because that was the question of an appropriation. That committee returned a report that the proposition involved was unconstitutional because it was going into the State to regulate manufacture. So I want to keep the question of Judge Jenkins, the chairman of the committee, in mind.

Mr. Mulhall, chief lobbyist for the association in the past, wrote some very interesting letters to Mr. Emery, the chief constitutional arguer now against the bill, and I quote from just one or two of them. This is found at page 1744 of Volume II:

MY DEAR JAMES: * * * I arrived in Chippewa Falls on Sunday morning about 4.30 a. m. and at 10 a. m. I called at the home of Judge Jenkins, and found him there and had a long and pleasant interview with him. Judge Jenkins gave me to understand that Mr. Kasson is East at the present time and that they do not expect him back until Thursday of this week; but a short time after I arrived at his home he called a meeting of some of his close political friends, and we had an interview regarding the situation in this district, which lasted for about two hours.

From the information I could get from those gentlemen, it appears to me that we have got a good fighting chance to win this district, providing that you can do as you told Judge Jenkins you would do to aid him, by raising some funds in the East so he could put the necessary workers going here as soon as possible to do so. The judge remembered the promise you made him in Washington and is very anxious to hear from you at the earliest moment.

Mr. REED. To whom is that letter?

Mr. KENYON. This letter is to Mr. Emery, a man who has been before the committee and argued for five hours against this bill, written by a gentleman known as Col. Mulhall, with exposing whom I think the Senator from Missouri had much to do.

I have been somewhat encouraged by the work of the past 24 hours, and I certainly believe that if we can raise the necessary funds to carry on the work here, that we will redeem this district and surprise the LA FOLLETTE forces, who feel at the present time so very confident.

That is a letter from the chief lobbyist, Mulhall, to the patriotic gentleman who wants to defeat legislation in the interest of the children of this country.

Again, in another letter, at page 1747:

I suppose that you have written to Mr. Emery as well as to me, because I should like to know just what he thinks about the situation. I am not as familiar with his promises to Judge Jenkins as I would like to be, and Mr. Van Cleave should have this before him for his guidance. However, I shall write Mr. Emery direct as soon as I have had a chance to look this over with Mr. Van Cleave. We must fix the situation up one way or the other.

Mr. REED. From whom is that letter?

Mr. KENYON. That letter is to "My Dear Martin," to Mulhall.

Mr. REED. From whom was it?

Mr. KENYON. From Schwedtman, who was secretary to the president of the association, Mr. Van Cleave.

Seemingly in reply to this correspondence is a letter from Mr. Emery, the eminent lobbyist, which the Senator from Missouri asked to have read, because he made the inquiry and asked him to read it:

MY DEAR COLONEL: You no doubt have me on your black list for apparent neglect of your very interesting and exhaustive letters. I found it necessary to attend a southern convention at Atlanta, Ga., and left here on family matters immediately on my return. I realize very keenly the critical nature of the Wisconsin situation, and I hope we have some lines out that will secure practical assistance within a few days. The extreme heat of the past week has apparently driven out of New York every man whom we have been most anxious to see, which has prevented the work I have been most anxious to do here in connection with the Jenkins decision.

That word evidently should be "election."

I am attending after to-morrow a convention of the State Bankers' Association, at which I expect to find some of the men I am most anxious to see.

Mr. REED. By whom is that letter?

Mr. KENYON. This is a letter by James A. Emery. I will only refer to one more, a letter from Mr. Mulhall to Mr. Schwedtman. These three gentlemen all seem to be involved, one in the mud as deep as the rest are in the mire. Mulhall writes Schwedtman June 2, 1909:

I had a telegram from Mr. Emery on Friday night, calling me to New York on Saturday morning. We had a conference in relation to the Washington situation, and he stated what he wished me to do and gave me to understand plainly what he wishes done while he is absent. He has put it up to me to fix the Judiciary Committee and the Labor Committee while he is away, and I feel certain I can have this done, as we have been working upon this for some time. It looks as though we would meet with success all along the line.

* * * * * * *

I particularly note—

Says the genial colonel—

what you say about our new president, Mr. John Kirby. You are right, dear old brother, for both you and I are too well drilled in military tactics to do anything else but strictly obey orders and do all we can for the grand association that we have the honor to serve.

I do not believe the National Association of Manufacturers countenanced the action of Emery.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. KENYON. I do.

Mr. REED. I think it is pertinent to the remarks the Senator has just made to epitomize the result of those hearings.

Mr. KENYON. How long will that take?

Mr. REED. About one minute and a half.

The evidence clearly shows that the three men who were engaged in managing this association were Mr. Schwedtman, Col. Mulhall, and Mr. Emery, and that Mr. Kirby gave his acquiescence to many things. Whether he knew the details or not may be said to be a question. My conclusion after reading this evidence was that the national council for industrial defense was, in fact, these four men, and that the members were composed for the most part from good institutions that had been induced to join upon the belief that they were simply to be kept advised of certain legislative proceedings.

The method employed by these four gentlemen was to send out alleged information to all the members and ask them to bombard Congress with letters and telegrams of remonstrance. So any movement started by these four men going out in the form of a circular letter to all this great membership would result in hundreds and perhaps thousands of letters and telegrams being sent to Congress, all based upon the statements they sent out.

An examination of the statements they did send out in many cases shows, in the first place, that they stated only one side of a proposition; that in many instances they misstated the facts, and in many instances misstated the law. So the letters which came to Congress at that time were based on this misinformation, and I have not the slightest doubt that every statement they send out now with reference to this bill is equally one sided, unfair, and unjust. Hence the protests which come, being based on that kind of information, ought to be considered in the light of the facts on which they are made.

Mr. KENYON. I thank the Senator for the suggestion, and I will call attention to the fact that in the bulletin they are sending out they refer to this proposed law as making it "a penal offense, punishable by fine or imprisonment, for any person to either ship or offer for shipment in interstate commerce any commodity produced in whole or part, in any mine or quarry, by the labor of a child under 14, or in any manufacturing establishment or cannery by the labor of a child under 16, or in any of such places by children under 16," which is an absolutely untruthful statement right there, confirming the statement of the Senator from Missouri that they made errors. I wish to take up the important question of the constitutionality of this proposed law.

CONSTITUTIONALITY OF A NATIONAL CHILD-LABOR LAW.

The power of Congress to pass a national child-labor act is based upon section 8 of the Constitution. The objections to said power of Congress are based upon the fifth and tenth amendments to the Constitution. I insert them at this point:

THE CONSTITUTION OF THE UNITED STATES.

Section 8. The Congress shall have power:

(3) To regulate Commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States, and with the Indian tribes.

AMENDMENTS TO THE CONSTITUTION.

ARTICLE V.

No person shall be held to answer for a capital or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a grand jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the militia, when in actual service, in time of war, or public danger; nor shall any person be subject, for the same offense, to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb; nor shall be compelled, in any criminal case, to be a witness against himself; nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public use without just compensation.

ARTICLE X.

The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people.

The third division of section 8 of the Constitution is a general clause giving the power to regulate commerce with foreign countries, among the several States, and with Indian tribes. The amendments to the Constitution which bear on the constitutionality of this act are, of course, the fifth amendment, commonly know as the due process of law amendment, and the tenth, relating to the powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution or prohibited by them to the States, being reserved to the States, respectively, or to the people.

It is not necessary, I know, with the Senate, composed of many lawyers who know constitutional questions better than I do, and it is perhaps somewhat presumptuous for me to review in detail the decisions of the Supreme Court on the question of the power of Congress over interstate commerce. I am not going to do that, although I am going to place excerpts in the RECORD.

I think some propositions, however, may be accepted as being fairly well established.

The power is the same as the power to regulate commerce with the Indian tribes, the same as the power to regulate foreign commerce. I realize, however, that there may not be an entire agreement about that proposition, because the regulation of foreign commerce inheres in sovereignty and would not depend upon this clause of the Constitution. Certainly it is true, however, as to the power over foreign commerce conferred by section 8 of the Constitution. The power to regulate foreign commerce is complete. The power to regulate commerce embraces the power to prohibit. The courts can not inquire into the motives of Congress. From those propositions it can be argued, as it has been argued in the Senate in the past, that Congress has absolute power to prohibit any commodity from being transported in interstate commerce.

I am going to discuss that proposition a little later. For the purpose of a national child-labor law and its constitutionality one does not have to take the position that Congress has the power to prohibit the transportation of all articles of commerce, but can stand, I believe, on a firm foundation in contending that Congress has the power not only to prohibit the transportation in interstate commerce of anything that is injurious to commerce itself, but that may be detrimental to public health, public morals, and public welfare, and that this applies either to the use to be made of the commodity or the method of its production. In other words, that the regulation of commerce may be not only for commerce itself but for the general public welfare. Now, that is outside of the fifth amendment.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. KENYON. I do.

Mr. HUGHES. I wish to call the Senator's attention to the fact and ask him on what theory Congress enacted a law known as the phossy-jaw bill, regulating the manufacture of matches?

Mr. KENYON. Of course, that is on a different theory. That is under the general power of taxation of Congress, because it is in the power of Congress to tax anything out of existence just as it taxed the circulation of the State bank notes out of existence.

Mr. HUGHES. But it was admitted that the tax proposed and actually laid would make it impossible for that industry to continue. So, it seems to me that Congress has the power to deny the right of the manufacturer to carry on his business in such way as to be a detriment to the public health and the general welfare, and if Congress can do it by means of a tax which is never meant to be laid, they can do it in some other way.

Mr. KENYON. That, of course, goes to the question of power, and is under an entirely different power in the Constitution than the regulation of interstate commerce. I will refer to that later. In the oleomargarine case, covering the identical question which the Senator raises, the Supreme Court sustained the proposition involved, even though it was virtually a tax to crush out the oleo industry instead of a tax to raise money, and everybody knows that; but the Supreme Court said: "You can not go into the motives of Congress." We have pending here the power-dam bill. There the question is involved; and everybody knows that the bill is being passed not for navigation at all—possibly I should not say "at all"—but the prime purpose is to get hydroelectric power. Everybody understands that, and every Senator in this body knows it. There will be a very small percentage of the construction of these dams that will help navigation. But, as was said here yesterday by the distinguished Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS], the peg we hang it on is that we have a right to pass such a bill to help navigation. So Congress does many things—to which I had intended to refer, but time forbids—really indirectly which it would not have the power to do directly.

Whenever the attempt has been made to enact a national child-labor law it has been at once contended—

That Congress can not prohibit the transportation of an innocuous commodity in interstate commerce, and that articles made by children are not in themselves harmful to the public welfare.

That such a law is an attempt to regulate the manufacturing business of the State instead of a regulation of commerce, and violative of both the fifth and tenth amendments to the Constitution.

That the right to manufacture is inherent in citizenship; that the power exists outside of the Constitution and beyond the same.

That the deprivation of right to ship in interstate commerce is violative of the fifth amendment.

That the power to regulate interstate commerce does not mean the power to prohibit; that regulation implies there will be no prohibition.

That Congress has no power to control the manufacture of goods in the State destined for interstate shipment, and, secondly, can not control the labor of persons engaged in manufacturing products intended for shipment in commerce.

These propositions cover in general the constitutional questions that arise with reference to a national child-labor law. As to some of the bills, however, now introduced and pending, another question might arise, to wit, that even if Congress has the power to prohibit the transportation in interstate commerce of goods made by child labor, has it the power to prohibit in interstate commerce all the products of factories or mines where child labor is employed? I think that is a difficult proposition and more of an administrative question, to which I will refer later and discuss it, if I have time.

There are a number of authorities seeming to sustain some of the propositions hereinbefore set forth as urged against the constitutionality of a national child-labor law. The subject is reviewed in Watson on the Constitution, volume 1, page 523. He reaches the conclusion that Congress has no power to pass a child-labor act or an act prohibiting the instrumentalities of commerce to goods made by women working over eight hours per day in factories; that it amounts to Congress controlling the manufacture in States of goods destined for interstate or foreign commerce; that such regulations belong to the State and resided there before the Constitution was adopted, and such power was never surrendered by the States to the General Government; and I think he makes the objection about as clearly as anyone else has done.

I referred some time ago to the report of the House committee, holding that this proposition was unconstitutional. That was many years ago. I ask to insert here that report as a part of my remarks, without reading it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the absence of objection, permission to do so will be granted.

The report referred to is as follows:

These subjects were considered by the Judiciary Committee of the House of Representatives, which arrived at the following conclusion:

"It seems to be the unanimous judgment of the courts, whose opinion must prevail, that, under the Constitution, Congress is powerless to prevent a monopoly in manufacture, or control or regulate a manufacturer of products for interstate-commerce shipment or the business or business matters of such manufacturer, agriculture, horticulture, stock raising, domestic fisheries, mining, or any other branch of human industry, or interfere with good order or public morals, lives, health, or property of citizens of the States (except in exceptional cases where jurisdiction is ceded by the States to the United States or an officer of the United States is interfered with in the discharge of some governmental duty, etc.), or limit or restrict the right to acquire control or dispose of property, or regulate the price at which property can be bought or sold, or make criminal the aims, purposes, and intent of persons in the acquisition and control of property.

"Therefore it plainly follows that Congress can not even exercise any jurisdiction or authority over women and children employed in the manufacture of products for interstate-commerce shipment, and certainly it will not be claimed by the foremost advocate of a centralized Government that Congress can exercise jurisdiction or authority over women and children engaged in the manufacture of products for intrastate shipment.

"The fact is, when the product is manufactured it is not known whether the same will be interstate commerce or intrastate commerce. It is not extreme or ridiculous to say that it would be just as logical and correct to argue that Congress can regulate the age, color, sex, manner of dress, height, and size of employees, and fix their hours of labor, as to contend that Congress can exercise jurisdiction over the subject of woman and child labor.

"The jurisdiction and authority over the subject of woman and child labor certainly falls under the police power of the States, and not under the commercial power of Congress. The suggestion contained in the resolution shows how rapidly we are drifting in thought from our constitutional moorings. Undoubtedly it is the earnest wish of all who desire the prosperity of the Nation that the proper line should always be drawn between the power of the States and the power of the Nation. Certainly there is no warrant in the Constitution for the thought or suggestion that Congress can exercise jurisdiction and authority over the subject of woman and child labor. If those performing such labor are abused, and conditions are such that the same should be improved, it rests for the States to act. The failure of the States to act will not justify unconstitutional action by Congress.

"Unquestionably Congress has the power to investigate conditions, ascertain facts, and report upon any subject. In the opinion of your committee, there is no question as to the entire want of power on the part Congress to exercise jurisdiction and authority over the subject of woman and child labor.

"In fact, it is not a debatable question. It would be a reflection upon the intelligence of Congress to so legislate. It would be casting an unwelcome burden upon the Supreme Court to so legislate. The agitation of such legislation produces an uneasy feeling among the people and confuses the average mind as to the power of Congress and the power of the States. The lives, health, and property of the women and children engaged in labor are exclusively within the power of the States, originally and always belonging to the States, not surrendered by them to Congress. Such is the emphatic language of the Supreme Court. If a question of good order and morals, it is the same. The argument has long since been made by others, and the committee can not add to it. The assertion of such power by Congress would destroy every vestige of State authority, obliterate State lines, nullify the great work of the framers of the Constitution, and leave the State governments mere matters of form, devoid of power, and ought to more than satisfy the fondest dreams of those favoring centralization of power.

"The National Government is too weak to undertake the exercise of the police power of the States. In a short time this great Nation would be worse than a ship in mid-ocean in a great storm, without a rudder or compass. The division of power was wise and beneficial. Time, study, and experience approve it, and we should not attempt in an unconstitutional way the destruction of the substructure of our Government. If, then, these two great powers of police and commerce are separate and independent, the power of the States sovereign, where is the authority for saying that Congress can invade and impair that power entire and independent in the States? The right and power of both the States and Nation must be respected and upheld.

"The committee is of opinion that Congress has no jurisdiction or authority over the subject of woman and child labor, and has no authority to suppress any abuses of such labor or ameliorate conditions surrounding the employment of such laborers." (Second sess., 59th Cong., H. R. No. 7304, 7.)

Mr. KENYON. Prentice and Eagan on the "Commerce clause of the Constitution" is another authority. Speaking of foreign commerce, and then turning to interstate commerce, the authors say:

Over interstate commerce no such extensive authority has been claimed. The right to engage in such commerce is one of the rights reserved to the people and one of the immunities of citizenship. Congress can not lay an embargo on interstate commerce. * * * The purpose with which the grant was made—to secure freedom of transportation throughout the country unembarrassed by differing regulations at State lines—measures not only the power of the States but also the power of Congress.

Chief Justice Marshall said on one occasion—I do not now remember the title of the case—that it was a matter of public history that the object of vesting in Congress the power to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States was to insure uniformity of regulation against conflicting or discriminating State legislation.

The somewhat discredited Knight case is generally referred to as an authority against such a law (156 U. S., 1), and it has been before the committee. In that case the court said:

The fact that an article is manufactured for export to another State does not of itself make it an article of interstate commerce, and the intent of the manufacturer does not determine the time when the article or product passes from the control of the State and places it in commerce, "and commerce begins where manufacture ends."

I do not believe the Knight case is regarded as authority in any court at this time. It has been thoroughly discredited. The dissenting opinion—which was the strongest opinion—of Justice Harlan has generally been accepted by lawyers and by courts as stating the proposition far better from a legal standpoint than it is stated by the majority opinion. I have always felt where anyone brought the Knight case into court to sustain a proposition that his case was in legal extremis.

Bowman against Chicago & North Western, One hundred and fifteenth United States Reports, page 611, and Kidd against Pierson, One hundred and twenty-eighth United States Reports, page 20, are also generally cited as against the full power of Congress over interstate commerce. In Kidd against Pierson the court said:

The functions of commerce are different. The buying and selling and the transportation incident thereto constitute commerce; and the regulation of commerce in the constitutional sense embraces regulation at least of such transportation.

In re Greene, Fifty-second Federal Reports, page 112, the court said:

Congress can not regulate the method of manufacture within the State.

Of course it can not. No one is contending for that under this proposed law.

In Willoughby on the Constitution, volume 2, pages 738 to 741, is a discussion of the Federal regulation of child labor. Referring to the Beveridge bill, the author states:

There has been no concealment, and, indeed, the bill bears sufficient evidence upon its face, of the fact that the purpose of the law is rather a regulation of the manner in which certain goods are manufactured or produced than of their transportation across State lines.

The author further goes on to claim that whatever injury is done by the employment of children in factories and mines is done when the article is in the process of manufacture or production, and over this manufacture the Federal Government has no control; and the author condemns the Beveridge child-labor law as unconstitutional, unless, the author states—one will go to the point of claiming that Congress has arbitrary power to exclude from interstate commerce any commodity that it chooses so to do—and concludes the discussion by the general conclusion that the Beveridge bill would be an attempt on the part of the Federal Government to regulate a matter reserved for the control of the States.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. KENYON. I do.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Senator from Iowa is reading from Prof. Willoughby, who, I understand, is of Johns Hopkins University?

Mr. KENYON. Yes.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I have before me a statement, which purports to have been made by Prof. Willoughby recently, in which he apparently recants.

Mr. KENYON. Yes; I have that statement also, I will say to the Senator; but I should be glad, if the Senator has it, if he would read it and comment on it. It is from an unpublished memorandum of Prof. Willoughby.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes.

Mr. KENYON. I should like to have the Senator read it at this point.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. It reads as follows:

This distinction between conditions of production and purposes or methods of use of commodities, though a real one, will probably not be held controlling. In neither case has Congress a direct regulative power—over neither the conditions of production nor the mode or use of consumption. If, therefore, in either case the prohibition can be construed to be, in fact, a regulation of interstate or foreign commerce, neither the ultimate effect nor the legislative intent embodied in the law may be inquired into by the courts. In result, then, it is to be admitted—

This is the particular part I had in mind—that the lottery case is authority for the doctrine that interstate carriers may be prohibited from carrying, or shippers or manufacturers from sending, from State to State and to foreign countries, commodities produced under conditions so objectionable—

This is the meat of the proposition—

as to be subject to control as to their manufacture by the State under an exercise of their police power or of the character designed or appropriated for the use which might similarly be forbidden by law.

Mr. KENYON. I thank the Senator. I had that reference and intended to place it in my remarks. I will say, too, that Gov. Baldwin, of Connecticut, in an article or an address, to which I will refer a little later, has taken almost the same ground as Prof. Willoughby in his recantation.

It was contended by Senator Beveridge in his argument upon his bill that Congress had the absolute power to prohibit the transportation of any article in interstate commerce. That is, of course, a very broad claim. My own judgment is that if Congress attempted so to do, arbitrarily and without any reason therefor founded upon public health, public morals, or public welfare, it would bump up pretty hard against the fifth amendment to the Constitution.

The clause of the Constitution giving this right to control commerce would sustain the position of Senator Beveridge, because it is an absolute power, if there were nothing else in the Constitution; but that power must be exercised with reference to the limitations of the Constitution found in the fifth amendment, so that——

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. KENYON. I do.

Mr. OVERMAN. Has Congress a right to prescribe directly the hours of labor or the age at which a child shall work?

Mr. KENYON. I think it has not.

Mr. OVERMAN. In the Senator's opinion as a lawyer, it has not?

Mr. KENYON. It has not.

Mr. OVERMAN. I think everybody will agree with the Senator that that is true. Now, I come to the question I was going to ask. Can Congress do indirectly that which it can not do directly?

Mr. KENYON. We have done it. The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. HUGHES] has instanced the phossy-jaw law and I have instanced the oleomargarine act.

Mr. OVERMAN. Another principle came into play in those instances. Action was taken by Congress in those cases because of the deleterious effect of the article itself. It is now proposed to prescribe that cotton goods, under certain circumstances, shall not enter into interstate commerce. Nobody contends that they are injurious or that their effect is immoral. It is upon those grounds that Congress has always held that certain goods should not be shipped in interstate commerce.

Mr. KENYON. I will answer the Senator in this way: I have no hesitancy in saying, of course, that if Congress should pass an act that children should not work more than a certain number of hours in North Carolina upon articles to be shipped in interstate commerce, Congress would have gone beyond its power. But we do not say that. Cotton or anything else can be manufactured in the mills of North Carolina employing children 4 years old, if they can work at that age. The proposed legislation which I am discussing does not stop that. The products of such factories in North Carolina can be sold in North Carolina. The proposed legislation does not stop children working, but simply says that if they are employed under a certain age the instrumentalities of commerce shall be withdrawn from those goods.

Mr. OVERMAN. Then is not the purpose of this bill to do that which Congress can not do?

Mr. KENYON. No; the purpose of this bill is to do just what Congress can do, and that is to stamp out child labor.

Mr. OVERMAN. What is the purpose of the bill?

Mr. KENYON. To stamp out child labor.

Mr. OVERMAN. Is not the purpose of the bill to regulate the hours of labor and the ages of employees?

Mr. KENYON. No; it is not. If manufacturers want to go on employing children, they can do so; the proposed legislation does not stop them.

Mr. OVERMAN. I understand the Senator's point; but is not the real purpose of the bill to provide that mill employees shall not work a greater number of hours than the hours prescribed in the bill and shall not employ operatives under the age specified?

Mr. KENYON. I understand that even under such a bill as has been enacted in Massachusetts the mill owners can have children of the age not prohibited work eight hours and then others work another eight hours, and carry on business in that way.

Mr. OVERMAN. I will ask the Senator frankly if it is not the purpose of this bill to have Congress do indirectly that which it can not do directly?

Mr. KENYON. Well, I do not say Congress can not do it directly. If it is in the power of Congress to pass an act under the commerce clause, then it does not make any difference what effect that act may have upon the manufacturing interests of any State or the agricultural interests of any State, or anything else, so long as it does not bump up against the fifth amendment to the Constitution.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. KENYON. I had agreed to conclude in a reasonable time, but I know if we get this constitutional question going we will never get through. However, I will yield to the Senator, because I always like to hear from him.

Mr. BORAH. I think I ought not to tempt the Senator.

Mr. KENYON. No; go ahead; I will be glad to hear the Senator.

Mr. BORAH. I was going to say that the question submitted by the Senator from North Carolina is to some extent met by the Northern Securities case. In that case it was contended that Congress was attempting to regulate the sale and transfer of stock in a State corporation, and that the effect of the legislation was to regulate and to designate how and under what circumstances stock in a corporation might be bought and sold within a State; but the court said, in effect, that the object and the purpose were to regulate interstate commerce, and the fact that in the exercise of this indisputable power, the transfer of stock in a private corporation, a matter which of itself would be within the power of the State alone to control, could not be considered as impeaching the act of Congress.

Mr. HARDWICK. Will the Senator from Iowa yield to me for just a moment? I will not take very long.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. KENYON. I do.

Mr. HARDWICK. I merely want to suggest to the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] that the difference between that proposition and this is obvious. There Congress was dealing with transactions that affected directly a great agency of interstate commerce, affected the agency itself. This is a different proposition entirely, as the Senator will find on reflection.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I do not want to enter upon the discussion of that question in the time which belongs to the Senator from Iowa. We may discuss that later.

Mr. KENYON. I was going to refer to that a little later. I am very much obliged to the Senator from Idaho. Those who take this view of Senator Beveridge's bill take the position that the question is one not of power, but one of discretion. Congress has the power to declare war to-morrow with any nation—I presume that power is still left in Congress; I hope so.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I do not know.

Mr. JONES. I doubt that very much.

Mr. KENYON. But it is not probable that it will declare war. Congress is supposed to exercise its power in a reasonable and common-sense way; but the argument that because power may be abused it does not exist is untenable. I am giving the other side of the question without in any way committing myself to the doctrine.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. KENYON. Just a moment.

Mr. OVERMAN. I dislike to interrupt the Senator if he does not want to be interrupted.

Mr. KENYON. Would the Senator mind waiting just a minute, until I conclude this branch of the discussion?

Mr. OVERMAN. I will not interrupt the Senator. I expect to submit some remarks on this question a little later in my own time.

Mr. KENYON. I would be very glad to have the Senator interrupt me in just a moment or two.

The Supreme Court of the United States has never squarely announced the doctrine contended for by Senator Beveridge. It has gone a long way, of course, in the Lottery case, but even in that case the question was left as an open one. As heretofore suggested, a strong argument can be made in favor of his contention from a long line of authorities, reaching from Gibbons v. Ogden down to a point as late as December 13, 1915, when the case of Weber v. Fread was decided by the Supreme Court. One has basis for the claim that the power of Congress over interstate commerce is absolutely complete, that it is the same as the power to regulate commerce with the Indian tribes, the same as the power to regulate foreign commerce, and that in the exercise of that power Congress may prohibit the transportation of any commodities, and that the motive of Congress in the exercise of that power can not be inquired into by the courts.

The argument can be further substantiated by reference to the fact that Congress has taken out of interstate commerce articles not in themselves deleterious, such as trust-made goods, goods made by convicts, bars of metal bearing the stamp U. S. A. assay, property owned by the railroads, as discussed in what is known as the Commodity Clause cases. Then we have the incidences of the prohibition of commerce in loose hay, explosives, and the like, which injure commerce itself; but of course that is a different question. Then, of course, the taking out of commerce of articles injurious to public health and public welfare, such as infected cattle, impure food and drugs.

Congress has also excluded misbranded liquors, and colorable C. O. D. shipments of liquors, likewise liquors shipped into States to be used in violating the law of the States. So that the range of the activity of Congress as to excluding articles from interstate commerce has been a wide one, covering articles in themselves injurious to commerce, articles that would be injurious only in the use of same by the consumer, articles intended to be used in defrauding, and so forth.

Relative to the power of Congress to prohibit the shipment of any article in interstate commerce, such questions are propounded as: Does Congress have the right to prohibit the shipment of corn, hay, or wheat in interstate commerce? Has it the power to prevent the shipment of goods in interstate commerce except those made by red-headed men or short-haired women? Can it prohibit the shipment of any goods except those made by union labor, and so forth, and so on ad infinitum? Of course, the answer could be made, as was made by Senator Spooner to questions propounded to him in the discussion of the oleomargarine-tax matter, that such situations could never arise. They could arise only if Congress should become absolutely crazy, which is perhaps too violent an assumption.

I can not myself agree with the position taken by Senator Beveridge that Congress could prohibit anything in interstate commerce. I can not harmonize that position with the fifth amendment to the Constitution. I do not see a way around the doctrine of such cases as the Austin case (179 U. S., 345), in which the court said:

> Whatever produce has from time immemorial been recognized by consent or law as a fit subject for barter and sale, particularly if its manufacture has been made the subject of Federal regulation and taxation, must, we think, be recognized as a legitimate article of commerce, although it may, to a certain extent, be within the police power of the States. Of this class is tobacco.

But I do believe that an enactment of Congress absolutely prohibiting the transportation in interstate commerce of intoxicating liquors would now be held by the Supreme Court to be constitutional.

Mr. OVERMAN. That is on another principle—that intoxicating liquors are injurious to mankind.

Mr. KENYON. Well, that is the very question.

Mr. BORAH. Is not that injurious at the other end? May we not consider the producers as well as consumers?

Mr. OVERMAN. No; I think not. Cotton goods are not injurious to anybody, but liquor is.

Mr. BORAH. But the making of the article is injurious to mankind under those conditions.

Mr. OVERMAN. The making of it is a matter for the State and not for the General Government. In the case of whisky, it is the article itself which goes into commerce that is deleterious.

Mr. KENYON. I suppose the Senator means deleterious to the consumer, not to the producer. It is an article that a substantial sentiment of the country believes is injurious to the public welfare, and if that question were put up to the Supreme Court they would have to consider it. If it did not shock their sense, as Prof. Parkinson in his argument said, of the reasonableness of things, they would hold it constitutional.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa further yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. KENYON. I do.

Mr. BORAH. Suppose the article in and of itself is not injurious or deleterious, is there no way in which Congress may keep it out of the channels of interstate trade?

Mr. KENYON. Why, of course. How is a lottery ticket, in itself, injurious to anybody?

Mr. BORAH. Then you come back to the proposition—and it is the one proposition which, it seems to me, settles this question—that so far as the channels of interstate trade are concerned, the Congress of the United States may exercise the police power.

Mr. KENYON. I will discuss the police-power proposition later. Of course police power on the part of the Federal Government is rather contrary to our notions of delegated power, and yet our Supreme Court has gone right up to the limit of saying that there is a Federal police power; in other words, that regulations of interstate commerce are not void because they may in themselves have the qualities of police regulations.

Mr. BORAH. It is not necessary to go so far as to say that the Federal Government has general police powers. But must we not conclude that the Federal Government enjoys the police power with reference to those particular matters which have been specially delegated to Congress, and one of them is interstate commerce? May it not exercise the police power with reference to policing the channels of interstate trade?

Mr. KENYON. I shall be very glad to have that question discussed. I am trying to reach the point where I was going to throw this matter open to discussion.

To prohibit the shipment in interstate commerce of articles such as wheat, corn, and iron, which could not be harmful in any way to the public welfare, but which are necessary and beneficial, would certainly be, in my judgment, an excessive, unreasonably arbitrary exercise of power, not due process of law, and violative of the fifth amendment to the Constitution.

Those in support of a national child-labor law, however, do not need to go to the extreme of Senator Beveridge's position. There is very late authority for the doctrine that if the carrying of certain articles in interstate commerce results in a use of those articles deleterious to public welfare Congress has the right to prohibit such transportation. These authorities go so far as the consideration of the question of the use by the consumer. I will agree that they do not go to the question of the production, and that is the only difference in the contention for a national child-labor law. The lottery cases and the white-slave case are in reference to what may happen at the end of the transportation; but the use to be made of a commodity after it reaches its destination is no more a part of interstate commerce than is the way in which an article may be produced, and I admit that that is the difficult proposition in this matter. The power of Congress to regulate or prohibit the transportation in interstate commerce of articles which in their use are injurious to public health, public morals, or public welfare is a power well established by these later cases.

I want to review, in order that I may have them in logical order in my argument, the general line of authorities.

I desire to insert in the RECORD, without reading, a number of citations and quotations therefrom. First, Gibbons against Ogden; then quotations from Mr. Justice Joseph Story's Commentaries on the Constitution; from the License Cases in Fifth Howard; from United States against Forty-three Gallons of Whisky, Ninety-third United States Reports, where the Supreme Court held that the power of Congress was absolute as to the Indian Tribes; from Brown against Houston, One hundred and fourteenth United States Reports, in which the court held that the power to regulate commerce among the several States is granted to Congress in terms as absolute as is the power to regulate commerce with foreign nations; Crutcher against Kentucky, One hundred and forty-first United States Reports, where the same principle is laid down; some extracts from Bowman against Chicago and North Western Railroad, One hundred and twenty-fifth United States Reports; Pittsburg Coal Co. against Bates, One hundred and fifty-sixth United States Reports; and Addyston Pipe & Steel Co. against United States, One hundred and seventy-fifth United States Reports.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the absence of objection, it will be so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

In Gibbon against Ogden (9 Wheaton, 197), the court says:

It is the power to regulate that is prescribed by the rule by which commerce is to be governed. This power, like all others vested in Congress, is complete in itself, may be exercised to its utmost extent, and acknowledges no limitatons other than are prescribed in the Constitution.

If, as has always been understood, the sovereignty of Congress, though limited to specified objects, is plenary as to those objects, the power over commerce with foreign nations and among the several States is vested in Congress as absolutely as it would be in a single government having in its constitution the same restrictions on the exercise of power as are found in the Constitution of the United States.

The greatest of all commentators on the Constitution, Justice Joseph Story (vol. 2, p. 1060, ed. of 1833), says:

Foreign and domestic intercourse has been universally understood to be within the national power. How, otherwise, could our theory of prohibition and nonintercourse be defended? From what other source has been derived the power of laying embargoes in a time of peace and without any reference to war or its operations? Yet this power has been universally admitted to be constitutional, even in times of the highest political excitement.

In the License cases (5 How., 504), at page 577, Chief Justice Taney says:

And Congress, under its general power to regulate commerce with foreign nations, may prescribe what article of merchandise shall be admitted and what excluded; and may therefore admit or not, as it shall deem best, the importation of ardent spirits.

Page 578—

The power to regulate commerce among the several States is granted to Congress in the same clause and by the same words as the power to regulate commerce with foreign nations and is coextensive with it.

Gibbons against Ogden is reaffirmed in nearly every decision that involves questions of interstate commerce. See United States v. Coombs et al. (12 Pet., 78).

In United States v. 43 Gallons of Whiskey (93 U. S., 194) the court says:

And Congress now has the exclusive and absolute power to regulate commerce with the Indian tribes—a power as broad and as free from restrictions as that to regulate commerce with foreign nations.

Under this power Congress has passed laws directing the manner in which trade and intercourse with the Indians shall be carried on, and forbidding anyone, under certain penalties, to give or sell liquor to an Indian in charge of an agent, or to introduce it into an Indian country; and these laws have been sustained by the courts.

In Brown v. Houston (114 U. S., 622), on page 630, it is said:

The power to regulate commerce among the several States is granted to Congress in terms as absolute as is the power to regulate commerce with foreign nations.

In Crutcher v. Kentucky (141 U. S., 47), on page 57, the court says:

It has frequently been laid down by this court that the power of Congress over interstate commerce is as absolute as it is over foreign commerce.

* * * * * * *

The prerogative, the responsibility, and the duty of providing for the security of the citizens and the people of the United States in relation to foreign corporate bodies, or foreign individuals with whom they may have relations of foreign commerce, belong to the Government of the United States and not to the governments of the several States; and confidence in that regard may be reposed in the National Legislature without any anxiety or apprehension arising from the fact that the subject matter is not within the province or jurisdiction of the State legislatures. And the same thing is exactly true with regard to interstate commerce as it is with regard to foreign commerce. No difference is perceivable between the two.

In case of Bowman v. Chicago, etc., Railway Co. (125 U. S., 465), on page 482, the court says:

The same necessity perhaps does not exist equally in reference to commerce among the States. The power conferred upon Congress to regulate commerce among the States is indeed contained in the same clause of the Constitution which confers upon it power to regulate commerce with foreign nations. The grant is conceived in the same terms, and the two powers are undoubtedly of the same class and character and equally extensive.

* * * * * * *

Again, on page 485—

So far as these regulations made by Congress extend, they are certainly indications of its intention that the transportation of commodities between the States shall be free, except where it is positively restricted by Congress itself, or by the States in particular cases by the express permission of Congress.

In Pittsburg, etc., Coal Co. v. Bates (156 U. S., 577), on page 587, the court says:

The power to regulate commerce among the several States was granted to Congress in terms as absolute as is the power to regulate commerce with foreign nations.

In Addyston Pipe & Steel Co. v. United States (175 U. S., p. 211), the court says on page 228:

Under this grant of power to Congress, that body, in our judgment, may enact such legislation as shall declare void and prohibit the performance of any contract between individuals or corporations where the natural and direct effect of such a contract will be, when carried out, to directly, and not as a mere incident to other and innocent purposes, regulate to any substantial extent interstate commerce. And when we speak of interstate, we also include in our meaning, foreign commerce. * * *

Page 229:

The provision in the Constitution does not, as we believe, exclude Congress from legislating with regard to contracts of the above nature while in the exercise of its constitutional right to regulate commerce among the States. On the contrary, we think the provision regarding the liberty of the citizen is, to some extent, limited by the commerce clause of the Constitution, and that the power of Congress to regulate interstate commerce comprises the right to enact a law prohibiting the citizen from entering into those private contracts which directly and substantially, and not merely indirectly, remotely, incidentally, and collaterally, regulate to a greater or less degree commerce among the States.

Mr. KENYON. Then I will ask permission to place a rather lengthy quotation from the lottery case in the RECORD. The lottery case has probably been as provocative of discussion as any case ever decided by the Supreme Court.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the absence of objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. KENYON. In the lottery case (188 U. S., 321) it was practically contended that the power to regulate did not include the power of absolute prohibition. The court said, on page 357:

As a State may, for the purpose of guarding the morals of its own people, forbid all sales of lottery tickets within its limits, so Congress, for the purpose of guarding the people of the United States against the "widespread pestilence of lotteries" and to protect the commerce which concerns all the States, may prohibit the carrying of lottery tickets from one State to another. In legislating upon the subject of the traffic in lottery tickets, as carried on through interstate commerce, Congress only supplemented the action of those States—perhaps all of them—which, for the protection of the public morals, prohibit the drawing of lotteries, as well as the sale or circulation of lottery tickets within their respective limits. It said, in effect, that it would not permit the declared policy of the States, which sought to protect their people against the mischiefs of the lottery business, to be overthrown or disregarded by the agency of interstate commerce.

In the lottery case, page 358, the court says:

If the carrying of lottery tickets from one State to another be interstate commerce, and if Congress is of opinion that an effective regulation for the suppression of lotteries carried on through such commerce is to make it a criminal offense because lottery tickets to be carried from one State to another, we know of no authority in the court to hold that the means thus devised are not appropriate and necessary to protect the country at large against a species of interstate commerce which, although in general use and somewhat favored in both National and State legislation in the early history of the country, has grown into disrepute and has become offensive to the entire people of the Nation. It is a kind of traffic which no one can be entitled to pursue as of right.

That regulation may sometimes appropriately assume the form of prohibition is also illustrated by the case of diseased cattle, transported from one State to another. Such cattle may have, notwithstanding their condition, a value in money for some purposes, and yet it can not be doubted that Congress, under its power to regulate commerce, may either provide for their being inspected before transportation begins, or, in its discretion, may prohibit their being transported from one State to another. * * *

Mr. KENYON. I want to insert a review of the lottery case by Edward B. Whitney, of New York, published in the Michigan Law Review in 1903, which is a most complete discussion of the lottery case.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

What is the true theory of this decision? Is the congressional power derived from the fact that the tickets are evil in themselves or deleterious in their effects? Is it to be followed only when the courts shall concur with Congress in considering any articles which may in future be prohibited to be similar evils, or has Congress a general power to prohibit any article whatever which in its own unreviewable legislative discretion it may consider deleterious? Has Congress the power to exclude any and therefore every article from interstate commerce and thus put an end to interstate commerce altogether? I think that the latter is the true analysis and the true scope of the decision, although the conservative language of the court leaves the question to some extent open for further argument. The court found no implied power in Congress upon which the legislation could be based. Congress has no general police power. It has no power to supervise the morals of our citizens, to prevent crime, or to restrain extravagance. This lack of general police power and lack of general power to suppress lotteries is pointed out by the dissenting justices, nor is it claimed by the majority of the court. The decision is squarely based upon one of the express powers of the Constitution—the power to regulate commerce. The dissenting justices maintain that this express power could not be invoked, because the power to regulate does not include the power to prohibit. The majority of the court, while not definitely committing themselves to the proposition that every prohibition is included within the power to regulate, maintains "the proposition that regulation may take the form of prohibition," and that whenever the general public opinion of the Nation may have come to regard an article of commerce, however once approved and favored, as "grown into disrepute" and offensive, so that commerce is considered both by the court and by Congress as polluted by the presence of that article, the removal of that pollution by exclusion of the article is within legislative authority. The next step forward the court declines to forecast. Statesmen, however, must attempt to forecast it, because they are confronted with the question whether Congress may deal with the problem of monopoly by exclusion of monopoly-made articles from transportation between the States.

It seems to me that Congress will ultimately be held to have the power to exclude any article from interstate commerce, because the power to regulate (which has now been decided to include the power to prohibit) is one of the enumerated powers of the Government. There is a radical distinction between the enumerated and the non-enumerated or implied powers. Presumptively, a power expressly granted by the Constitution is unlimited, unless limitations are implied from another section of the instrument.

Mr. KENYON. As the Senator referred to Prof. Willoughby, it is interesting to note the view of a very distinguished authority on constitutional law, Gov. Baldwin, of Connecticut. I think he was formerly chief justice of his State—I am not certain of that, but I think he was—and professor of constitutional law at Harvard. While he does not support the policy of this legislation, it seems clear that he considers it well within the power of Congress to enact. In a presidential address before the American Academy of Political and Social Science he said:

Would it not again be an admissible regulation to provide that no goods should be the subject of interstate commerce until they had been inspected by Federal officers, or unless, as manufactured goods, they had been manufactured at an establishment conducted in a way approved by Federal authority? Long steps in these directions have, indeed, been already taken by the acts of Congress as to pure food and the inspection of packing houses. The Constitution of the United States is, in my opinion, flexible enough to bear a construction supporting legislation by Congress in such directions far in advance of anything hitherto attempted.

Chief Justice Marshall expressed that thought in the following sentence, from Gibbon against Ogden, which I do not think anyone here or elsewhere can improve upon:

The power over commerce, like all others vested in Congress, is complete in itself, may be exercised to its utmost extent, and acknowledges no limitations other than are prescribed in the Constitution.

Then, I also quote Prof. Willoughby on the lottery case and his suggestions as to the fifth amendment. I also quote from Ware & Leland against Mobile County, Two hundred and ninth United States Reports; the Northern Securities case, One hundred and ninety-third United States Reports; and the Second Employers' Liability case, Two hundred and twenty-third United States Reports; also from the brief of Solicitor General Bowers, which was one of the best briefs ever prepared on the questions involved in interstate commerce.

Prof. Willoughby, referring to the lottery case, said:

In result, then, it is to be admitted that the lottery case is authority for the doctrine that interstate carriers may be prohibited from carrying, or shippers or manufacturers from sending, from State to State and to foreign countries commodities produced under conditions so objectionable as to be subject to control, as to their manufacture, by the States under an exercise of their police powers, or of a character designed or appropriate for a use which might similarly be forbidden by law. Furthermore, the case is probably authority for the power of Congress to provide laws directed against manufacturers and shippers generally, rather than against the commodities produced or sold by them, and excluding them from interstate and foreign commerce so long as they fail to conform to conditions which, if imposed by State law, would be upheld as proper police measures.

Interesting also is Prof. Willoughby's suggestion as to the fifth amendment and the constitutional limitations upon the power claimed:

The question as to the extent to which Congress is limited by the due process of law requirement when exercising the power granted it by the commerce clause is one not wholly free from difficulty, but this much at least is clear, that Congress may not, under the guise of an exercise of its commerce power, any more than it may under the guise of any of its other powers, work a direct deprivation of a particular property right or a direct impairment of a specific contract right. From this it follows that, granting that an individual has a vested right to engage in interstate or foreign commerce, he can not be arbitrarily excluded therefrom, either as a shipper or carrier or importer, except in so far as such exclusion may be held to be incidental to the regulation of such commerce.

Referring to the Lottery case, in Ware & Leland v. Mobile County (209 U. S., 405), on page 410, the court says:

In that case the Federal act prohibiting the transmission of lottery tickets was sustained because of the actual carriage in interstate traffic of the tickets themselves.

In the very famous case, Northern Securities Co. v. United States (193 U. S., 197), on page 335, the court says:

By the express words of the Constitution Congress has power to "regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States, and with the Indian tribes." In view of the numerous decisions of this court, there ought not, at this day, to be any doubt as to the general scope of such power. In some circumstances regulation may properly take the form and have the effect of prohibition. (In re Rahrer, 140 U. S., 545; Lottery case, 188 U. S., 321, 355, and authorities there cited.) Again and again this court has reaffirmed the doctrine announced in the great judgment rendered by Chief Justice Marshall for the court in Gibbons v. Ogden (9 Wheat. 1, 196, 197), that the power of Congress to regulate commerce among the States and with foreign nations is the power "to prescribe the rule by which commerce is to be governed"; that such power "is complete in itself, may be exercised to its utmost extent, and acknowledges no limitations other than are prescribed in the Constitution"; that "if, as has always been understood, the sovereignty of Congress, though limited to specified objects, is plenary as to those objects, the power over commerce with foreign nations and among the several States is vested in Congress as absolutely as it would be in a single government having in its constitution the same restrictions on the exercise of the power as are found in the Constitution of the United States"; that a sound construction of the Constitution allows to Congress a large discretion "with respect to the means by which the powers it confers are to be carried into execution, which enable that body to perform the high duties assigned to it in the manner most beneficial to the people"; and that if the end to be accomplished is within the scope of the Constitution, "all means which are appropriate, which are plainly adapted to that end and which are not prohibited, are constitutional."

Page 342, the court further says:

Is there, then, any escape from the conclusion that, subject only to such restrictions, the power of Congress over interstate and international commerce is as full and complete as is the power of any State over its domestic commerce?

In the Second Employers' Liability cases (223 U. S., 1), on page 48, the court quotes with approval from the brief of the late Solicitor General (Bowers):

Interstate commerce is an act. Congress, of course, can do anything which, in the exercise by itself of a fair discretion, may be deemed appropriate to save the act of interstate commerce from prevention or interruption, or to make that act more secure, more reliable, or more efficient.

The court held that Congress, in the exercise of its power over interstate commerce, could regulate the relations of common carriers, by railroad and their employees, while both are engaged in such commerce, subject always to the limitations prescribed by the Constitution and to the qualification that the particulars in which those relations are regulated must have a real or substantial connection with the interstate commerce in which the carriers and their employees are engaged.

Of course, the case of Adair against the United States (208 U. S., 161), goes off on a different theory. The rule there prescribed is with relation to the discharge of an employee who was a member of a labor organization. The court says (p. 178):

Manifestly, any rule prescribed for the conduct of interstate commerce, in order to be within the competency of Congress under its power to regulate commerce among the States, must have some real or substantial relation to or connection with the commerce regulated.

And the court held there was no logical connection between the carrying on of interstate commerce and membership in a labor organization. Further, Two hundred and eighth United States, 180:

> We need scarcely repeat what this court has more than once said, that the power to regulate interstate commerce, great and paramount as that power is, can not be exerted in violation of any fundamental right secured by other provisions of the Constitution.

And the court held that the provision was in violation of the fifth amendment.

To the same effect is the Coppage case in Kansas, which went to the Supreme Court of the United States.

The case of Hoke against the United States (227 U. S., 308), known as the white-slave case, is one of the most interesting and decisive on this question. The court there said (p. 322):

> Our dual form of government has its perplexities, State and Nation having different spheres of jurisdiction, as we have said, but it must be kept in mind that we are one people; and the powers reserved to the States and those conferred on the Nation are adapted to be exercised, whether independently or concurrently, to promote the general welfare, material and moral. This is the effect of the decisions, and surely if the facility of interstate transportation can be taken away from the demoralization of lotteries, the debasement of obscene literature, the contagion of diseased cattle or persons, the impurity of food and drugs, the like facility can be taken away from the systematic enticement to and the enslavement in prostitution and debauchery of women and, more insistently, of girls.

The court in that case discussed the pure food and drug act. Congress could not prohibit the manufacture of that article, referring to an article manufactured in the State; it could not prohibit its sale within a State, but it can prohibit its transportation between the States, and, as the court said, by that means defeat the motives and evils of its manufacture. So that if it is in fact a regulation of commerce, it does not make any difference how it affects the manufacturer.

If this be true, while Congress can not provide as to who shall be employed within a State in its manufacturing enterprises or the age or hours of service, yet it can prevent the transportation between the States of articles made by the labor of mere children, which labor is condemned by the best judgment of mankind as destructive of the growth and development of children.

In the case of Hipolite Egg Co. v. United States (220 U. S.), under the pure food and drug act, the court said:

> The statute rests, of course, upon the power of Congress to regulate interstate commerce, and, defining that power, we have said that no trade can be carried on between the States to which it does not extend, and have further said that it is complete in itself, subject to no limitations except those found in the Constitution. We are dealing, it must be remembered, with illicit articles—articles which the law seeks to keep out of commerce, because they are debased by adulteration, and which law punishes them and the shipper of them.

The law makes these adulterated articles outlaws of commerce. Can it not also make articles made by child labor outlaws of commerce? Why not?

The pure-food act is also construed in McDermott v. Wisconsin (228 U. S., 115), where the plenary power of Congress over interstate commerce is sustained. In that case Justice Day said:

> Congress may itself determine the means for barring articles from interstate commerce; and so long as they do no violence to the other provisions of the Constitution, Congress is itself the judge of the means to be employed in exercising the powers conferred on it in this respect.

In Wilson v. United States (232 U. S., 563), another late case, it is held that the white-slave act has the quality of a police regulation, although enacted in the exercise of the power to regulate interstate commerce. The court says (page 567):

> The prohibition is not in terms confined to transportation by common carrier, nor need such a limitation be implied in order to sustain the constitutionality of the enactment. As has already been decided, it has the quality of a police regulation, although enacted in the exercise of the power to regulate interstate commerce.

Now, as to the immoral woman transported in interstate commerce, there is no harm to commerce in the woman on the train being transported; not a particle. It is the immoral act at the end of the journey.

Weber against Fread, decided by the Supreme Court December 13, 1915, a very late case, arose under the act of July 31, 1912, making it unlawful to bring into the United States films of prize fights which would be used for public exhibition. Now, what was there in the film of a prize fight that could be injurious to commerce? Nothing. It was the use to which it was to be put that was harmful to public morals. I grant you that case does not cover the question of its production. That is the only difference. That is a pretty thin ledge to stand on.

Mr. OVERMAN. That is the line of difference now.

Mr. KENYON. That is the only line of difference there is.

Mr. REED. That power was also the power of Congress to prohibit bringing articles into the country.

Mr. KENYON. Yes; that is true.

Mr. REED. That is different.

Mr. KENYON. But it is the same in principle as to the use to be made at the other end.

Mr. REED. But the power to regulate commerce between the States is not the same as the power to regulate commerce with foreign ports.

Mr. KENYON. I am not going to consent to the Senator's statement; but the power to regulate interstate commerce and foreign commerce and commerce with the Indian tribes is in the same clause of the Constitution. I said a while ago that I do not believe that clause is necessary as to foreign commerce, because it inheres in sovereignty.

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, there would not be any question but that we could prohibit the importation of corn into this country; would there?

Mr. KENYON. Not a particle.

Mr. BORAH. Then it must be different from what it is between the States.

Mr. KENYON. Except the corn of some citizen of the United States. Then you would be taking his property.

Mr. OVERMAN. We prohibit interstate commerce in corn and wheat——

Mr. KENYON. Just a minute. Does the Senator from Idaho think that the term "person," as used in the fifth amendment, would apply to one who is not a citizen of the United States?

Mr. BORAH. No. I think there is a difference between the power of Congress under the interstate-commerce clause with reference to foreign and domestic commerce. I do not think the fifth amendment has anything at all to do with the matter of bringing things into this country.

Mr. KENYON. I do not either, unless it is imported by a citizen of this country.

Mr. BORAH. I thought the Senator was misunderstood in his statement. That was the reason why I called attention to that.

Mr. KENYON. But I do say that the Supreme Court has said time and time again that the power to regulate interstate commerce is the same as the power to regulate foreign commerce.

Mr. BORAH. It has used that language; and yet the distinction has been made by the court that there is a difference in the exercise of the power, because there is no doubt of our ability to prohibit the importation into this country of anything we desire to prohibit.

Mr. KENYON. I agree with the Senator. It grows out of the question of sovereignty.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. KENYON. I do.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Let me ask the Senator from Iowa if this is not true: In so far as Congress refers the exercise of its authority to the commerce clause, the power over interstate commerce and over foreign commerce is precisely the same. But in dealing with foreign commerce we may go beyond and outside the limitations of the commerce clause, and may do what we do by virtue of our sovereignty. In other words, the Government of the United States has inherent sovereign powers in dealing with foreign nations, but it has no inherent sovereign powers in dealing with matters which relate to the States alone.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. KENYON. I do.

Mr. REED. That was the thought that I had in mind, and I thought the Senator from Iowa was not expressing himself as he really intended to, and that is the reason why I called attention to it—not in an antagonistic spirit at all.

Mr. KENYON. I do not think we disagree. I accept the suggestion as true, and the statement of the Senator from Utah is as I have always understood it. I meant to say that, but no doubt I was unfortunate in my language.

In the case of Weber v. Fread, to which I have referred, the court said:

> The ground relied on for the relief was the averment that the prohibition of the act of Congress in question was repugnant to the Constitution because in enacting the same "Congress exceeded its designated powers under the Constitution of the United States and attempted, under the guise of its powers under the commerce clause, to exercise police power expressly reserved in the States."

The court also said:

> But in view of the complete power of Congress over foreign commerce and its authority to prohibit the introduction of foreign articles recognized and enforced by many previous decisions of this court, the contentions are so devoid of merit as to cause them to be frivolous.

It was contended in that case that the question at issue was not one of regulation of foreign commerce, because the real purpose was to forbid the exhibition of the films after they were brought in, and such was a subject to which the power of Congress did not extend. The court held this contention to be of no merit; further, that it rested upon the erroneous assumption that the motive of Congress in exerting its plenary power could be taken into view for the purpose of refusing to give effect to such power when exercised.

A few days ago the Supreme Court passed on the question of the power to exclude from commerce medicines carrying with them untruthful statements. That was in the Seven Cases v. The United States, decided January 10, 1916. It has not been reported in any of the reporters as yet. But, of course, there it is true that the untruthful statement went along in commerce with the article, and that gave them their interstate character.

On the question of the distinction in the power of Congress to prohibit deleterious commodities in commerce and otherwise, the recent enactment of Congress with reference to intoxicating liquors is interesting. In State of West Virginia v. Adams Express Co. the court says:

> That the Congress has power to outlaw and exclude absolutely or conditionally from interstate commerce intoxicating liquors or any other deleterious substance has been very often decided. The distinction is between things deleterious and things beneficial or innocuous. The power to regulate is the power to make reasonable rules of admission or exclusion. The power to exclude intoxicants absolutely or conditionally does not import the power to exclude sound wheat.

I have reached a point now where I merely want to sum up from these authorities, and I shall be very glad for any suggestion or any questions. I think any candid lawyer, if he will be candid with himself, must say that he can not be absolutely certain one way or another on this proposition, but that the leaning is so strong toward its constitutionality that Congress ought to hesitate under those circumstances before denying the right to have the question determined by the Supreme Court.

I simply want to make these points and a summary of a few cases. Under the commerce clause of the Constitution the power to regulate commerce is complete and plenary. If the commerce clause existed without anything else in the Constitution to limit it, we could prohibit the shipment of anything in commerce.

Mr. OVERMAN. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question there? When does the jurisdiction of Congress begin as to interstate commerce?

Mr. KENYON. When the article is offered to commerce.

Mr. OVERMAN. When it is started on its way?

Mr. KENYON. When it is offered on its journey as commerce. The Senator goes to a railroad office and buys a ticket——

Mr. OVERMAN. When it is put on the platform and ready to be shipped then it becomes interstate commerce. Here you propose to limit the production of cotton mills while it is in the mills.

Mr. KENYON. No; that is just where we do not agree. We do not propose to limit it at all. You may go on with your cotton mills, and if you have a market in your State you can employ all the children you want to employ. We simply say that there is a public conscience in this country, a moral health in this country, and that public morals is against child labor.

Mr. OVERMAN. I agree with that.

Mr. KENYON. You can go on in your State if you are not going to carry those child-labor goods out to other States, but when you do, those people have a right to know. You have no right to ship it to a place where it offends the moral conscience, and if you attempt so to do we will withdraw the instrumentality of commerce.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Is not what the Senator says with reference to a child-labor law exactly the situation with reference to the existing lottery ticket law? If Louisiana desires to maintain a lottery and confines the operation to her own State and sells the tickets in her own State there is nothing in the congressional law on that subject which would interfere with her. It merely affects the interchange among the States.

Mr. KENYON. Allow me to suggest to the Senator from Utah, I like to have his opinion, and I hope that some day he will be where he will have to pass on these questions. He would adorn the highest court of the Nation. Take the lottery case. Here is something that troubles me about the lottery case. The lottery ticket is a part of a great gambling scheme. It is not simply the way the ticket is to be used at the end of a journey. It is connected with the inception of the whole fraudulent scheme. Does the Senator see any difference between that and merely something that is going at the end of the journey to be used to debauch the public?

Mr. OVERMAN. There is a difference. Cotton goods do not debauch anyone at the end of a journey. A lottery ticket debauches everyone who engages in them.

Mr. HUGHES. Before the Senator leaves that point——

Mr. KENYON. I am not going to leave it yet. We will say that the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MARTINE] is buying goods. Here is a mill employing children and one not employing children. I think I know the Senator from New Jersey well enough to know that he would patronize the mill that is not employing children. He has a right to know what he buys. He knows he is buying an article, but he can not tell which are made by children and which are not made by children. He knows that in his State they would not be made by children. He has a right to know by whom the goods were made. In other words, the consumer has some right on the moral health proposition, because the people of this country do not want to encourage the labor of mere children by buying products from the mills employing them. So you have to consider the consumer in that matter, too. It does affect the consumer, and the consumer can not tell by looking at it. He can put a microscope on it and he can not tell whether it was made by a child or made by a man 50 years old. He has a right to know, because there is a moral health to our civilization and our people just as well as there is a mental or physical health. I yield to the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. HUGHES. If the Senator will allow me, I wish to refer to the situation in reference to the Louisiana lottery about which the Senator from Utah made a point. It never occurred to me before. The Senator is assuming that the difference between that thing and the one we propose to deal with by the proposed legislation is that a fraudulent scheme is carried on by the instrumentality of commerce. The Senator must remember that there is nothing necessarily fraudulent about the Louisiana lottery. The Senator, of course, remembers that many governments, only a very few years ago, and some governments now, carry on lotteries. When I went to Panama they sold lottery tickets on the church steps on Sunday morning.

Mr. KENYON. Where?

Mr. HUGHES. At Panama.

Mr. KENYON. The Senator was on his way to church?

Mr. HUGHES. No; I think I had started out of church when I found them. I wish the Senator to admit some difference, because the Senator's environment would necessarily make him think that any gambling proposition would spring directly from the devil. It seems to me that if the United States can deny instrumentalities of commerce to the Louisiana lottery, there being no law of the United States, at least the Louisiana lottery offending against no law of the United States, it could stand just as well in the eyes of the law as cotton or any other industry.

Mr. KENYON. I hope the Senator did not understand me as indicating that the lottery case does not give the absolute power to Congress to prohibit anything that might be offensive to public morals. I was simply raising the question for the better judgment, as I regard it, of the Senator from Utah. The argument I have heard advanced before the committee as to a distinction between the lottery case and the law of this bill. I think there is no appreciable difference.

Mr. HUGHES. I called the Senator's attention to the fact that I did not think there was any distinction between two industries, neither of them offending against the law of the United States.

Mr. KENYON. I agree with the Senator.

Mr. HUGHES. The Federal Congress denies the instrumentalities of commerce to one, and there is no reason why it should not, if it chooses, deny the instrumentalities of commerce to the other.

Mr. KENYON. I agree with the Senator, but I also like to look at the other side of the proposition and see if I can find a flaw in the argument. It is helpful to always look fairly at both sides of a proposition.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. In the Lottery case, before the passage of the act of Congress, the business had been outlawed by the people in substantially all the States in the Union. It was opposed to the moral sense of practically all the people of the country. My understanding of the reason which underlies the decision is that it was based upon the thought that the lottery ticket was connected with a business which had been outlawed. The Senator said a moment ago with reference to the liquor business, I think, that we might prohibit absolutely the transportation of intoxicating liquors among the States. I am very much disposed to think that if Congress would take the position that intoxicating liquor was an outlawed thing and would repeal its laws with reference to the taxation of intoxicating liquors, the inspection of its manufacture, and so on, it would then have the power to absolutely prohibit it from entering into the channels of interstate commerce.

If the Senator will allow me further, it is apparently a question as to the stage of public sentiment. There was a time 75 or 100 years ago when no one particularly objected to lotteries. Very likely if it had been attempted at that time to prohibit the transportation of lottery tickets in interstate commerce the Supreme Court might not have upheld the act of Congress. But in the meantime a great change occurred in the sentiment of the people. The thing had become outlawed and was opposed to the overwhelming moral sense of the people. Then Congress could step in and say it is an outlawed thing and we will deny to it the right of interchange among the States.

Mr. KENYON. That would come within the legislative discretion of Congress.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Exactly.

Mr. KENYON. To be exercised reasonably. If unreasonably exercised the court could step in.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. It seems to me that the question must, to a certain extent, turn upon the proposition whether or not the States in pursuance of their police power have a right to prohibit the thing.

Mr. KENYON. That would be one way of getting public sentiment.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Obviously the State would have no power to prohibit the growth of wheat or the growth of corn or the interchange of wheat and corn among the people of a State.

Mr. OVERMAN. May I ask the Senator from Utah a question?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I have about finished, if the Senator will permit me to conclude. Obviously the State would have no power to do that. That would not be the exercise of the police power, but obviously the State has power and has exercised the power to forbid lotteries, and it has exercised the power to forbid the employment of immature children as a great evil.

Mr. KENYON. In all but two of the States, I think.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. That may be correct, in all but two States. That being so, the question, to my mind, very largely turns upon whether or not Congress may not say this thing, under the lawful exercise of the police power of the States, has been forbidden the right of existence, and Congress may now step in in support of the moral sentiment and the attitude of the States in having outlawed it and prevent the dissemination of the evil, the development of the evil, by denying it the right of transportation among the States.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator from Utah is familiar with the lottery cases, as he is familiar with all cases in the Supreme Court, as I have found, for I have served with him in the committee. I wish to know if he read the opinion of Judge Harlan in that case where he said the court has gone about as far as it will go, and in fact notified the profession that it had gone about as far as it will go.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The court does not quite say that.

Mr. OVERMAN. In effect it says that. Judge Harlan himself said it.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The court in effect says that the decision of the court is confined to the facts of that case.

Mr. OVERMAN. That is really the same expression, that it is about as far as we will ever go on that subject.

There is another question I wish to ask the Senator. There is a moral sentiment also in this country for an eight-hour law. Could Congress prohibit wheat and corn from entering into commerce where any labor was employed in the production of wheat and corn for more than eight hours a day?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. No; I do not think Congress could. It is possible I may change my mind about that in the future, of course, but that is my present view.

Mr. OVERMAN. Then what is the difference between fixing the hours in the mills and fixing the hours on the farms?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Let me say, if the Senator from Iowa will permit me——

Mr. KENYON. Very well.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I think it is very different. The statement I made a moment ago I think illustrates the difference. I do not think that a State could prohibit the production of wheat in a State, wheat itself being an entirely innocuous thing. That being so, I do not think that Congress could forbid its transportation in interstate commerce. It can not be made an outlawed thing, in other words. Neither has it thus far been held that the hours of labor may be restricted in a healthful out-of-doors employment like farming. The power to fix by legislation the eight-hour day seems to be limited to employments of such a character that long hours of labor are detrimental to the health of the individuals engaged in them.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Will the Senator from Iowa yield to me for a moment?

Mr. KENYON. I yield to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I wish to suggest to the Senator from Utah I have heard the argument before the committee on this matter, and in every case which has been called to my attention, where the power of Congress to prohibit interstate transportation of a commodity has been upheld, it has been on the ground that the commodity transported was in itself noxious or dangerous to health or morals. In the bill it is not the thing itself that is noxious. The only claim of the advocates of the bill is that something that was done in the home State in the manufacture of the article is against the public welfare. This is the only instance, so far as I know, where Congress is attempting to prohibit in interstate commerce a perfectly legitimate article of commerce for the purpose of accomplishing a police regulation in a State. It is not the child labor that is prohibited from transportation; it is the legitimate product of commerce. I think that is the distinction in this case.

Mr. KENYON. How does the Senator distinguish the Lottery case? The lottery ticket itself is not a harmful thing; it is the use to which it is put.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The lottery ticket in itself was a harmless piece of paper, but it was a contract between the gambling shop and the consumer. The lottery ticket, together with the circular, report, and instructions which went with the ticket through the United States mails, was a part of the paraphernalia of the gambling institution itself, and hence in that way was per se noxious, just as much as the acts of the officials of the company or sending the prize money would be.

Mr. KENYON. Take the White Slave case; the transportation of the immoral woman herself did not injure interstate commerce.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. No; but the result of the transportation and the purpose of it was an immoral transaction.

Mr. KENYON. So the production of goods in the way they are produced is immoral, according to the general sentiment of the Nation. You have your standard as to matters that are immoral and you finally get down to the crux of the matter. On the question of general welfare, is production any different from consumption?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. We have forbidden transportation in interstate commerce of game taken in violation of the State laws. Game is a wholesome article of food. There is no objection to that. It is not deleterious in any way. While it may be distinguished in other respects from the question which the Senator from Connecticut propounded in this particular respect there is no distinction.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The distinction that I recall the court made in that case was that game was not an article of interstate commerce at all but it was the property of the State, and it was differentiated in that way.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. That is true so far as that goes, but after it has been reduced to possession——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Then there was no title in it. It ought to be interstate commerce.

Mr. KENYON. Now, take the shipment of cattle from an infected area. Congress prohibited that. Some of those cattle are just as good as any cattle could be and some are not. You are prohibiting the shipment in commerce of a perfectly innoxious article.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. But the purpose is to prevent the distribution of the diseased cattle. It is to suppress a danger from being spread over the country. It is not an attempt to regulate the internal affairs of a sovereign State, which has all the power it has not expressly delegated.

If the Senator has a single case I should like to have him produce it, where the Supreme Court up to date has ever held that Congress has the power to prohibit the interstate transportation of an article perfectly legitimate in itself.

Mr. KENYON. The lottery case.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The Senator will admit that the power sought to be exercised in that legislation goes right up to the verge and the limit of the furthest extent he has advocated.

Mr. KENYON. I do. I say this legislation goes into a new field.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. And if Judge Baldwin's opinion is correct on the subject, which the Senator cited, is it not almost equivalent to saying that wherever, in the opinion of Congress, the public welfare is to be promoted, irrespective of the opinion of the localities of the several States, that there Congress has the power under the commerce clause of the Constitution to regulate the internal affairs of the States if Congress thinks it is for the public welfare?

Mr. KENYON. Of course, regulating the internal welfare of the States is one way to put it. Such regulation, however, is merely incidental to the regulation of commerce. Congress has power to prohibit transportation in interstate commerce of articles that are made in such a way or to be used in such a way that they may threaten or diminish or tend to destroy the high standard of our civilization. Congress determines that standard in the exercise of its legislative discretion. So I have no question in my mind that Congress could pass a law preventing the shipment in interstate commerce of goods made in factories where women work over eight hours a day.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Or where women work at all.

Mr. GALLINGER. Or men.

Mr. KENYON. There is a distinction between men and women. Now, that illustrates the difficulty of this situation. The Supreme Court in the New York case, as to the bakers, discussed the question of men's work. It is quite different from the decision of the Supreme Court in the California case and the Oregon case, where they discussed the working of women as being on a different basis entirely, as the Senator from New Hampshire knows as well as anyone. That illustrates when you get to the Supreme Court the question is simply of reasonable or unreasonable regulation. If my friend from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND] were on the Supreme Court, I would not have much question about the decision. If my friend from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] was there, I would guess the other way.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, there is simply one question I am going to ask. I am interested in the Senator's discussion of the matter. Yesterday I received a letter from a very prominent citizen of my State, a man who has the esteem of our entire citizenship, in which he very calmly discussed this matter. He asked me, it is true, to vote against the bill.

Mr. KENYON. Is he a manufacturer?

Mr. GALLINGER. He is a manufacturer without guile.

Mr. KENYON. There are those, I know.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes; he has a large establishment that never has had a strike, and where he has the most contented class of men that could be conceived in his employ. He made this point, that if this legislation is constitutional on the ground that it is detrimental to children to work under certain conditions, may the next step not be that it is detrimental to the health of men to work 10 hours in some establishment where they are only working 8 hours in another establishment, and whether we may not go to the point to say that we have a right, based upon the theory of this legislation, to exclude from interstate commerce goods produced by men who are working 10 hours, or probably 12 hours a day, and in that way doing detriment to their health and very likely to their offspring?

That was the point raised, and I should like to ask the Senator, in all seriousness, if that is not a possibility?

Mr. KENYON. I am very glad to answer the Senator as best I may, though I doubt very much whether the man who suggests a question like that to the Senator could be absolutely without guile.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator knew the man he would agree with me that he is a man who holds to the highest ideals of proper life in every regard.

Mr. KENYON. I want to answer the Senator's question fairly. Of course, he could have gone further and asked if Congress could go to the extent of saying no article shall be shipped as interstate commerce unless it is produced by a colored man in the light of the moon, and so forth.

Mr. GALLINGER. I do not think that is a fair comparison. He put it on the point that it was a detriment to health. They very seriously argue in certain quarters that men ought not to work more than eight hours. Indeed, I observed that a gentleman haranguing an audience in Boston Commons said a little while ago that no human being ought to work more than six hours a day. It was upon that basis my correspondent submitted the matter to me.

Mr. KENYON. Now, let me answer the Senator, since he propounded the question. First, the power to regulate commerce is limited by the fifth amendment. If a bill could be passed here providing, as the Senator's friend suggests, that no goods shall be transported in interstate commerce from a factory where men work over eight hours, when they get to the Supreme Court they must take up the general situation of the country as bearing upon reasonableness what the States have done about it, what the sentiment is in the country, and what effect that has upon the country as bearing on the question, whether it is reasonable or unreasonable, whether it is arbitrary or not, and if unreasonable and arbitrary, it is unconstitutional.

That is the best answer I can give. So the Senator can group all that he might ask under that rule.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will say to the Senator that I propounded the interrogatory more particularly for the reason that I propose to send my friend the very able speech which the Senator has made, and I will go further and say that, as a layman, I had very seriously wondered whether this proposed law in constitutional or not. I remember that when Senator Beveridge was so eloquently discussing it, the leading lawyers of this body at that time said to me it was unconstitutional clearly. But I go further and say that, as at present advised, I propose to vote for the bill, leaving the question of its constitutionality to be determined by the courts. I asked my question in entire good faith.

Mr. KENYON. And I tried to answer in the best of faith.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. KENYON. I do.

Mr. BORAH. Does not the Senator accept the proposition that the Federal Government has police power with reference to channels of interstate trade?

Mr. KENYON. I say that the Government is a Government of delegated powers. I do not well see just how it can have what are commonly known as police powers in the States. I do not think it makes much difference what you call it, the Government has what practically amounts to police power in the regulation of interstate commerce.

Mr. BORAH. Of course the Federal Government is a Government of delegated powers, but there has been delegated to the National Government the exclusive power to regulate interstate commerce. No other power can police the channels of interstate trade. The States can not do it, and if the National Government can not do it no one can do it.

Mr. KENYON. I agree with the Senator. It is a question, then, what police power belongs to the States.

Mr. BORAH. If you are dealing with the subject of interstate trade and the channels of trade that are being overlooked by the National Government on the ground of public welfare and the morals of the people, it must be the police power, is it not? What other kind of power would it be? It could not be anything but police power. While they do not call it that in so many words, that is what it is. It could not have been anything with reference to interstate commerce which sustained the white-slave act. There is no principle which has ever been laid down by the Supreme Court with reference to interstate commerce upon which that could be based unless it is upon the proposition that, so far as the channels of interstate trade are concerned, the Government has the right to exercise the police power.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The Supreme Court of the United States was careful to refrain from stating that it was the police power or that the Nation had any police power. What it said was that the undoubted power of Congress to regulate commerce among the States would not be allowed to be defeated, because the means which they took to regulate commerce might partake of the nature of police power, which is quite a different thing from saying what is known in the States as police power.

Mr. BORAH. I do not think the Supreme Court did hesitate to say——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Well, they refrained.

Mr. BORAH. I do not think they refrained entirely from saying it, either, because they placed it absolutely upon the question of protecting the morals of interstate trade. What is it except the police power by which you protect the morals of interstate trade? It is not interstate commerce in the technical sense in which we use the term; it is the police power, pure and simple.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. It is the regulation of commerce by power, and it is purely an academic question whether you call it police power or not. It is the power to regulate commerce.

Mr. KENYON. That is exactly what I have been saying. It does not make any difference what you call it. I argued that question the other day—perhaps I did not argue it, but visited it out—with the Senator from Connecticut, that there was a police power; but in our talk he rather got my mind confused about there being a national police power as we understand the term. However, it is the same thing whatever we call it—the right to protect the channels of commerce.

Mr. BORAH. I do not claim that there is the general police power which obtains within the State, but I claim with reference to these special delegations or the delegation of power over a particular subject, that with reference to that subject the National Government may exercise the police power.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Why not compromise by calling it "power analogous to police power," and let it go at that?

Mr. BORAH. I think that would be all right; but I prefer the other proposition, because it is the correct proposition.

Mr. KENYON. I advise the Senator from Idaho not to get very near the Senator from Connecticut on that proposition or he will confuse his mind.

Mr. BORAH. I will only say that Cooley, in his Constitutional Limitations, years ago very clearly laid down in a paragraph—which I thought I had in my desk, but which I find I have not—that the National Government had the right to exercise the police power with reference to the channels of interstate trade.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me to have the RECORD correct, I want to say, in reference to the gentleman to whom I referred, my correspondent, that he is conducting a business in which he employs neither women nor children.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, before the Senator from Iowa goes on, I should like to understand his position. I do not know whether I understand it correctly or not. In a colloquy between the Senator from Iowa and the Senator from Utah, did I understand him to say that the Supreme Court, in deciding a great constitutional question, as he called it, decided it according to what the public sentiment of the country is?

Mr. KENYON. Oh, no; I did not mean that at all. If I said that, I was very unhappy in the use of my language.

Mr. OVERMAN. I did not think the Senator meant that.

Mr. KENYON. I said that the Senator from Utah would view this perhaps in one way if he were on the Supreme Bench, while the Senator from North Carolina would view it the other way. The court would undoubtedly take into consideration what the States had done as representative of the general sentiment upon this subject as bearing upon the question of whether it was a reasonable or unreasonable regulation.

Mr. OVERMAN. Then, they ought to be governed by the public sentiment as to their decision on a great constitutional question?

Mr. KENYON. The Senator can say that if he wants to, but he can not say it as coming from me.

Mr. OVERMAN. That is what I understood the argument would lead to.

Mr. KENYON. I do not say any such thing or anything like it. The question came up of goods made by those in slavery——

Mr. OVERMAN. It is not so much what the Senator says as what the Senator from Utah has stated, that the Supreme Court would be governed——

Mr. KENYON. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. OVERMAN. It is what the Senator from Utah said, and I understood the Senator from Iowa to agree to it.

Mr. KENYON. I think we will compromise that by going on.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I do not understand what I am charged with having said.

Mr. KENYON. I do not understand it, either.

As to the question of whether Congress could pass a law prohibiting the shipment of goods made by those in slavery, a question which had never been suggested in the past, I do not believe there is anyone now but would believe that in the present state of the public mind Congress could do that very thing. I think there have been some bills with reference to the importation of rubber goods from foreign countries made by those in slavery. The chairman of the Interstate Commerce Committee in the other House introduced a bill that no person should ship in interstate commerce for purposes of slaughter bull calves less than 2 years of age or heifers less than 7 years of age—pretty healthy-sized heifers. [Laughter.] That gentleman is a great lawyer, and I presume he considered his bill was constitutional. That bill was for the preservation of the meat supply and went to a question of the general welfare. I want to hurry on and finish, Mr. President. I have stated before the proposition that if the power exists the effect on the manufacturing interests of the State or the agricultural interests is immaterial. This proposed law does not regulate manufacturing within the States.

The States can employ their children just as they please; they can carry on their business just as they please; but we can withdraw from them the instrumentalities of interstate commerce. The only difference in the decision is whether or not the consumer and the producer are alike considering this question. I read from the Hoke case with reference to manufacturing, and I have heretofore asserted that the consumer is interested in the problem of knowing what goods he is to use. I have also discussed the fifth amendment and the question of keeping out of commerce wheat, oats, and so forth, and stated that the question of the violation of the fifth amendment depends on whether it is an unreasonable and arbitrary regulation. I want to lay down the proposition, too, that the fifth and fourteenth amendments are alike, and that an act which is not inhibited under the one, as taking without due process of law, is not inhibited under the other. Due process under the fourteenth amendment has been defined in many cases, as in the Oregon case and the California case, affecting a law governing the hours of service for women. How can there be any difference? If the fixing of the hours for service for women in a State in a manufacturing institution does not violate the fourteenth amendment, then certainly legislation by Congress is such that results in that very thing as to children does not violate the fifth amendment. I do not see any difference as affecting the due-process clause of the Constitution between the situation in the California and in the Oregon cases or, indeed, in the Illinois case, which involved child labor, and this present situation.

A child-labor act of Illinois of 1903 was construed in the case of Sturges & Burn Manufacturing Co. against Beauchamp, Two hundred and thirty-first United States, page 320; it was held that a classification in employment of labor of persons below 16 years of age is reasonable and does not deny equal protection of the laws. It was also held that the Illinois child-labor law was not unconstitutional as denying due process of law, as depriving the employer of liberty of contract, or of his property by requiring him at his peril to ascertain the age of the person employed. The court says:

> The Federal question presented is whether the statute as construed by the State court contravenes the fourteenth amendment. It can not be doubted that the State was entitled to prohibit the employment of persons of tender years in dangerous occupations.

It also held that the State could compel employers at their peril to ascertain whether those they employed were, in fact, under the age specified, saying:

> The proposition of absolute requirements of this sort is a familiar exercise of the protective power of the Government.

A very important case is Muller v. Oregon (208 U. S., 412), passing on the Oregon statute of 1903, which provides that no female shall work in certain establishments more than 10 hours a day, held not to be unconstitutional so far as respects laundries. It was contended that the statute was a violation of the fourteenth amendment; that it prevented parties making their own contracts; that it did not apply equally to all persons similarly situated; that it was not a valid exercise of the police power.

The court says on page 421:

> It is undoubtedly true, as more than once declared by this court, that the general right to contract in relation to one's business is part of the liberty of the individual, protected by the fourteenth amendment to the Federal Constitution; yet it is equally well settled that this liberty is not absolute and extending to all contracts and that a State may, without conflicting with the provisions of the fourteenth amendment, restrict in many respects the individual's power of contract. Without stopping to discuss at length the extent to which a State may act in this respect, we refer to the following cases in which the question has been considered: Allgeyer v. Louisiana (165 U. S., 478); Holden v. Hardy (169 U. S., 366); Lochner v. New York (198 U. S., 45).

The court took the view that the limitation placed upon the woman's contractial power as to the power she should labor was not imposed solely for her benefit, but also largely for the benefit of all. So also might be argued the limitation as to children laboring—for the benefit of all.

In Miller v. Wilson (236 U. S., 373), the Californian case arising out of their State statute limiting the hours of labor for women, the court said:

> As the liberty of contract guaranteed by the Constitution is freedom from arbitrary restraint—not immunity from reasonable regulation to safeguard the public interest—the question is whether the restrictions of the statute have reasonable relation to a proper purpose.
> It is manifestly impossible to say that the mere fact that the statute of California provides for an 8-hour day, or a maximum of 48 hours a week, takes the case out of the domain of legislative discretion. This is not to imply that a limitation of the hours of labor of women might not be pushed to a wholly indefensible extreme, but there is no ground for the conclusion here that the limit of the reasonable exertion of protective authority has been overstepped. Nor, with respect to liberty of contract, are we able to perceive any reason upon which the State's power thus to limit hours may be upheld with respect to women in a millinery establishment and denied as to a chambermaid in a hotel.
> Dealing with practical exigencies, the legislature may be guided by experience. (Patsone v. Pennsylvania, 232 U. S., 138, 144.) It is free to recognize degrees of harm, and it may confine its restrictions to those classes of cases where the need is deemed to be clearest. As has been said, it may "proceed cautiously, step by step," and "if an evil is specially experienced in a particular branch of business," it is not necessary that the prohibition "should be couched in all-embracing terms."

The case of Jacobson v. Massachusetts (127 U. S., 11) was an act relating to compulsory vaccination, and the law was held valid as a proper exercise of the police powers with reference to public health and not against the fourteenth amendment.

In Holden v. Hardy (169 U. S., 366) the court there considered an act of the Legislature of Utah. That act limited the employment of workmen in underground mines to eight hours per day, except in cases of emergency. That act was held to be a valid exercise of the police powers of the State.

In Hawley v. Walker (232 U. S., 718) the question was the constitutionality of an act prohibiting the employment of "females over 18 years of age" to work in "any factory, workshop, telephone or telegraph office, millinery, or dressmaking establishment, restaurant, or in the distributing or transmission of messages more than 10 hours in any one day or more than 54 hours in any one week." The constitutionality of the law was sustained.

In Riley v. Massachusetts the plaintiff in error was convicted upon the charge of employing a woman in a factory at a different hour from that specified in a notice posted in accordance with the statute relating to the hours of labor. The general provision of the statute being found to be valid, the particular requirements which were the subject of special objection were also upheld as administrative rules designed to prevent the circumvention of the purpose of the law.

I am citing these cases merely on the question of the fourteenth amendment, as there have been hardly any cases on the fifth amendment.

The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] says we can not do indirectly what we can not do directly. Congress has taxed out of existence undesirable cotton-future contracts, although it could not directly regulate the making of cotton-future contracts. It has undertaken to tax opium out of existence. It has levied a tax upon the circulatory notes of State banks for the express purpose of destroying their circulation. It has levied a tax on oleomargarine not to raise revenue, but to exterminate colored oleomargarine; and in McCray v. United States (195 U. S., 27), known as the oleomargarine case, the court said:

> From this it follows, as we have also previously declared, that the judiciary is without authority to avoid an act of Congress exerting the taxing power, even in a case where to the judicial mind it seems that Congress had, in putting such power in motion, abused its lawful authority by levying a tax which was unwise or oppressive or the result of the enforcement of which might be to indirectly affect subjects not within the powers delegated to Congress.

On the question of national police power, I wish Senators would read the late decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States. For instance, the case of L. Lawrence Weber against Frederick S. Freed, decided December 13, 1915, which refers to this subject and also to another subject which has been discussed here. In that case the court say:

> But in view of the complete power of Congress over foreign commerce and its authority to prohibit the introduction of foreign articles, recognized and enforced by many previous decisions of this sort, the contentions are so devoid of merit as to cause them to be frivolous.

That was on the question of the power of Congress. The court further say:

> Moreover, the proposition plainly is wanting in merit, since it rests upon the erroneous assumption that the motive of Congress in exerting its plenary power may be taken into view for the purpose of refusing to give effect to such power when exercised.

In the Hoke case the court say:

> The principle established by the cases is the simple one, when rid of confusing and distracting considerations, that Congress has power over transportation "among the several States"; that the power is complete in itself, and that Congress, as an incident to it, may adopt not only means necessary but convenient to its exercise, and the means may have the quality of police regulations. (114 U. S., 196, 215; Cooley Constitutional Limitations (7th ed.), 856.) We have no hesitation, therefore, in pronouncing the act of June 25, 1910, a legal exercise of the power of Congress.

Again, in a very late case, the Eckman case, decided January 10, 1916, the court say:

> So far it is objected that this measure, though relating to articles transported in interstate commerce, is an encroachment upon the reserved powers of the States, the objection is not to be distinguished in substance from that which was overruled in sustaining the white-slave act (36 Stat., 825). (Hoke v. United States, 227 U. S., 308.) There, after stating that "if the facility of interstate transportion" can be denied in the case of lotteries, obscene literature, diseased cattle and persons, and impure food and drugs, the like facility could be taken away from "the systematic enticement and the enslavement in prostitution and debauchery of women," the court concluded with the reassertion of the simple principle that Congress is not to be denied the exercise of its constitutional authority over interstate commerce, and its power to adopt not only means necessary but convenient to its exercise, because these means may have the quality of police regulations.

Now, Mr. President, I have taken a great deal more time than I should have done. I do not know, if Congress has a doubt about the constitutionality of a proposed legislative enactment, just what its duty is. That is for each Member to determine. It is a principle of constitutional law, however, that all legislation, whether of Congress or of the States, must be taken to be valid unless the contrary is clearly shown. Of course, when a law comes before a court for interpretation it is to a certain extent limited by the fact that every presumption is in favor of consitutionality. Hence Congress should carefully consider constitutional questions. But it does seem to me that a mere question in one's mind as to whether or not a court may hold a statute unconstitutional is not enough to warrant voting against a measure even where it may fairly be said to be a somewhat doubtful question. The simple question here in the last analysis and in summing it all up is, Is this law a regulation of commerce? If so, no effect on manufacturing can be considered. That is entirely immaterial, provided there is no violation of the fifth amendment to the Constitution. So I have worked out in my own mind this principle—I do not know whether it will stand, but I believe it will, and I believe the day is coming when it will be recognized—that Congress has the right to exclude from interstate commerce anything that tends to imperil the standards of public health, public morals, public safety, and public welfare, which in the judgment of Congress are proper standards for the civilization of our age.

Now, Mr. President, I want to say in conclusion that I have been hurried. I did not expect to take over an hour's time, but one thing has led to another.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. KENYON. I do.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am sure I do not want to break in on the continuity of the Senator's remarks or to encroach upon the time which he wishes to make use of; but, if the Senator is about to conclude, I should like to ask him if this question at last does not resolve itself into whether it is a proper exercise of the police power applied to interstate commerce? I have reflected for some time on that, running through several years, and I have resolved the doubt in favor of the power, and shall support this bill accordingly.

However, before the Senator concludes, I want to ask him to direct his remarks to this phase of the power that is either existing or not, as the case may be: The primary purpose of this regulation is to prevent child labor, not in the States where it may be lawful, where it is not now prohibited by State enactment, but to prevent child labor generally throughout the United States.

Mr. KENYON. To stamp it out.

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir. That is, as I understand, the purpose of this remedial legislation. Now, keeping that in mind, Mr. President, in the case of the oleomargarine law, whatever the other motives may have been for its enactment, one motive was to prevent deception. Oleomargarine is not necessarily unwholesome; it does not possess any deleterious qualities when taken into the human system, but it is so similar to the natural product that, to prevent the deception, a tax, which is in a large measure prohibitive, was imposed upon it, and sustained as an exercise of the police power—not to prevent interstate traffic in a deleterious substance, but a deceptive traffic in a lawful substance, in order that the general public might be protected from deception. That is one ground on which such a law might be sustained. Another is that a thing which is in itself lawful in its origin may become in its use, applied to the general public, hurtful or contrary to either the public health or morals or, in general, contrary to the public welfare.

The lottery tickets to be issued were lawful in the State of their origin, but became unlawful because of their general effect upon the public, and were accordingly properly excluded from interstate commerce. If deception is used in connection with a lawful article, lawful in the place of its origin, the general public may be protected by an act of Congress against the unlawful imposition of that article upon the general public whereby a deception is effectually carried out.

Now, what is the difference, does the Senator think, between such a case as that and protecting the general public throughout the United States against the effects of child labor by excluding from interstate commerce, as a necessary and very effective means of stopping child labor, articles manufactured by child labor?

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I have discussed that subject and advanced that theory some time ago when the Senator was probably absent. I have said that the consumer was interested in the question of how the goods which he purchased were made and had a right, in contemplation of the general moral health of the Nation, to know whether the goods were made by child labor or not. If they were, he might not want to use them. So I do not want to go back to that if the Senator will excuse me; but I am glad of the Senator's statement and to have it added to my remarks.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, will the Senator pardon another interruption?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PHELAN in the chair). Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. KENYON. Certainly.

Mr. CLAPP. That point was made before the committee; and, while it may not be important, I for one would not want to be placed in the attitude of accepting that challenge as made before the committee. I do not believe that we have got to base this proposed legislation on the proposition that the consumer has the right to know. I believe we can put it upon the basis that the citizens of any State and of every State have a right to be protected against the effects upon the citizenship of child labor; and I believe the sooner we come right out and put it on that broad ground the better it will be for all concerned.

Mr. KENYON. I trust the Senator did not understand that I took any other position than that.

Mr. CLAPP. No. I merely had in mind that that suggestion was in a way acquiesced in in the committee.

Mr. KENYON. We have been having a general discussion here of both sides of it. I have stated time and time again my view of the situation. There is little doubt in my mind as to the constitutionality of the measure, because of the power of Congress in the interest of the general public welfare to take out of interstate commerce those things that are injurious to the public welfare.

Now, Mr. President, I merely want to say that I have been interested in child-labor legislation for a good many years. It has appealed to me. In congressional life I know we have a good many disappointments. It seems frequently as if it were not worth while, and that there was not very much being accomplished of particular benefit to our fellow men. I feel, however, that there are compensations in public life as in this instance, where the opportunity is presented to help in a modest, humble way to fight the battle for the children of this country. I do hope that we are to be given an opportunity to vote upon this bill at no distant date. It will mark a milestone in the progress of legislation enacted for the benefit of humanity.

Mr. President, from the humble manger of Bethlehem came the greatest social worker of the world. He gave His life as an act of social service. Inspirational are his utterances concerning children:

> But whoso shall offend one of these little ones which believe in me, it were better for him that a millstone were hanged about his neck and that he were drowned in the depth of the sea.
> Even so it is not the will of your Father which is in heaven that one of these little ones should perish.
> But Jesus said, Suffer little children, and forbid them not to come unto me; for of such is the kingdom of heaven.

If we destroy them, we destroy the hope, the dream, the faith, the prayer that the kingdom of heaven may some day come to earth.

In a book by Markham, Lindsey, and Creel is a little statement which I want to read. It is as follows:

> Of late years we have fallen into a journalese habit of asking what Christ would have thought of this or that, or what He would have done in such and such a place. For instance, writers and preachers have surmised as to the Master's feelings and actions were He set down in Chicago or put in charge of a newspaper or given control of a department store, etc., etc., all of which has been interesting rather than important.
> No one, however, has yet written a book or preached a sermon on "What Christ would have thought of child labor." Yet it is quite an obvious title, for the slightest consideration of the Gospels will show that Jesus was incessantly and passionately interested in the welfare and happiness of children as well as in the securement of industrial and economic justice for those who perform the world's toil.
>
> Christ in the last analysis was an agitator, a rebel, an insurgent. He swept his barren, wretched land like a flame, crying out against burdens too grievous to be borne, striking terrible blows at ancient evils and established injustice. He preached heroic love and service, and the brotherhood of man was as much on his lips as the fatherhood of God. In no sense is that wonderful career at all intelligible save when considered as a heroic attempt to substitute a more wholesome and brotherly environment for cruel industrial conditions.
> We may have to guess what Jesus would do if He came to Chicago or if He edited a daily paper, but we can tell authoritatively what He would do if brought face to face with the present child-labor problem of the United States.
>
> Imagine Him in a Gulf coast shed of a cold, raw morning before the dawn, holding in his lap a whimpering, chilled, sleep-sick lad of 8 or 9 and looking at the little fingers with holes eaten into them by the acid that exudes from the head of a shrimp! Or amid the noise and dust of the anthracite coal breakers, where boys just entering their teens dare disease and death! Or in the dark inner rooms of a city tenement, where babies work 10 to 15 hours a day, making artificial flowers!
> A nation that builds its religions about Jesus of Nazareth and erects thousands of churches to His glory and still permits its industrial machine to mangle nearly 2,000,000 little children is a nation that is on the road to spiritual death.

Mr. President, those who advocate this kind of legislation may be called altruists, sentimentalists, reformers, or what not. It makes little difference to them. They will go on with the fight, a fight that must eventually be crowned by victory. Justice, not charity, is the need of the age. Justice is the foundation of all social order. The old order passeth: Men crippled in industrial pursuits, women's backs bent by long hours of toil, children destroyed by labor in mines and factories, their little lives ground into dividends. The new order cometh where it shall be easier for every day men and women to live and enjoy life, to have their little homes, to develop ideals, to realize hopes. We have the right to the vision of a broad humanitarian nation interested in humanity as well as prosperity. That vision is becoming a reality, although possibly slowly; then happy, healthy children, strong vigorous men, home-making mothers and wives, a people not devoted to the principle of each for himself, but rather to the principle of each for the other; a nation whose only throne is justice, a republic whose mission is to keep open wide the doors of opportunity not only for those of to-day but for the children of to-morrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PHELAN in the chair). The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH].

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, the particular amendment now before the Senate offered by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] is of itself not of very great importance. It applies to a rental charge made only in cases where the permittee or grantee uses public lands. I presume that if this bill is enacted into law in its present form or, for that matter, in any other modified form, there will be comparatively few instances in connection with navigable streams where Government land will be used; but notwithstanding that, Mr. President, there is a very important and, as I believe, fundamental principle involved in this amendment. The particular place in the bill where it is provided that public lands shall be used is the only place in the bill where there is any provision made for rental for any of the privileges given to permittees or grantees. It is provided that the charge that shall be made shall be based upon its value as land, and it is admitted by those who are behind the bill in its present form that that particular provision—the one I have read and the one which the amendment of the Senator from Montana seeks to strike out—was put into the bill to prevent the making of a lease by the Secretary of War in which he should charge a rental or make a charge on any other basis than that connected with the land; in fact, that he should thereby not be allowed by the law to make a charge on the horsepower developed.

That brings before us at once the question whether, in these leases, we ought to give to the Secretary of War, or any other authority to whom we may delegate the power to make these leases, the power to charge for the horsepower developed. I concede to begin with that this is a very important and fundamental principle upon which honest men may honestly disagree; and while I am very decidedly of the opinion, from what study I have given to this subject, that we ought to give to the Secretary of War such authority and such power, and that he ought to exercise it, I am perfectly willing to concede that it is a question with two sides to it, and I have no fault to find with the Senator or the individual who takes a different viewpoint. That is the point that I want now to discuss. I think it is the real question involved in the Senator's amendment, although fundamentally I would carry it much further if I could, and make it apply to all cases, whether any Government land is used or not.

Mr. President, I believe we ought to give to the Secretary of War the power to charge a rental based upon the development of the power at the particular point where the permittee is allowed to dam the stream and build an obstruction, and in my judgment he ought to have this authority, because I believe it would tend to regulate the charges and in the end redound to the benefit of the consumer of the electricity that is developed at that point. That is the reason why I favor it. I believe it is the belief of those who favor that kind of a provision that it is a regulatory power, and places in the hands of the Secretary authority of law that will regulate and in the end prevent monopoly and give to the consumer of power a lower rate.

We must remember, Mr. President, that in dealing with this question we are only trustees. We are not dealing with our personal property. We are not here giving rights to dam streams and build obstructions in navigable waters that we personally own. The Secretary of War, if this bill is passed, will be a trustee, and we are acting now in the capacity of a trustee. The Secretary of War, if this bill is passed, will be acting in that capacity, representing all of the people of the United States. The particular land upon which the dam is to be built, so far as this amendment applies, at least, is Government land, owned by all the people. If through that ownership we can regulate a power that is to be developed there for the benefit of the communities, the people at large, we ought not to give away that right. We ought to protect that right as fully as though we were individuals dealing with something that we personally owned, making a lease of it to some one who wanted to operate it; and it is on that theory that I believe we ought to provide by law sufficient authority for the person who represents all the people of the country—the Secretary of War, in this case—so that he will not fritter away the rights that the people own.

I can easily conceive that there might be, and would be, probably, in the practical operation of this law, many cases where the permittee, the person who was applying for the right to build this dam, would come in direct competition, let us say, with some other corporation which was developing in that vicinity hydroelectric energy that was produced by steam. For the purpose of illustration let us say it cost the steam company $10 a horsepower to develop their power. Let us say that the man who developed water power on this Government stream could develop and get his power to the market for $5 per horsepower.

When the man who developed the horsepower has his power ready to sell, does anybody believe that he would put it on the market for any lower price than was necessary to get the business away from the man who was developing power by steam? In that case, if the steam man had to pay $10 and the water man $5, then if he should sell the power at a price, let us say, of $9.50 per horsepower, he would get the business. Suppose there was a charge of $1 on the horsepower that had to go to the Government. He would sell it for exactly the same price as though there was no charge made by the Government. In other words, coming in competition with other power that cost more money, he would get his power on the market just enough below his competitor to get the business; and if that figure was not above the actual cost and the rental fee that he paid to the Government, he would get and operate the business.

Why, then, should not the Government or the Secretary of War or the Congress, representing the people of the United States, owning the land upon which this power dam is to be built, give to the person that we are going to designate in this law to represent the people of the United States sufficient authority so that in making the lease in that kind of a case he would be able to get for the owners of that property—the people of the United States—a fair rental that would still permit the permittee or the grantee to operate and get the business and still make a very large and liberal profit?

There might be other instances where it would be to the interest, perhaps, of large corporations owning power plants, either steam or water, located in a certain community where there was an additional water-power site in a navigable stream, to make application under this law, if it were passed, for the purpose of developing power at that additional site, with no intention of developing it to its full capacity, for the purpose, perhaps, of preventing somebody else from getting it and developing it to its full capacity, and thus putting it in competition with some established business, with the effect of lowering the rates to the consumer. Suppose the Secretary of War, in representing the people, the owners of this land that is going to be taken away, should say to the proposed permittee: "I will lease you this particular site for the development of power, and I will provide in the lease that if you develop it to its full capacity and sell it, then the amount of rental shall be nominal only; but if you develop only half of it, then the lease shall provide that you must pay a dollar, two dollars," or some other sum that he might set, "for the power you develop." That would give him a leverage of a regulatory nature by which he could compel the development of the entire power; and I take it that that is what all of us want. We want the maximum amount of power developed. It is only by the development of the maximum amount of power that the best results and the lowest price can come to the consumer and the greatest development of the country or the community can take place.

Suppose there is another locality where, after this bill becomes a law, some man makes application to the Secretary of War for the development of power by the building of a dam in a navigable stream—let us say in the vicinity of some city, some village, or perhaps several cities—and the Secretary of War, when he applies, if he had the authority to demand any rental, would say to the applicant, "Now, if you develop this power and sell it to this municipality, where it will go directly to the people of the community, the citizens of that municipality, I will charge you a rental that is only nominal, practically nothing; but if you develop this power and sell it to another corporation, and that corporation in turn sells it to the municipality, or perhaps to another corporation, and they sell it to the municipality, then the rental that I will charge you"—and it must be so provided in the lease—"shall be a higher rate." In other words, again he would use his power to cut out the middleman and get the electricity at the lowest possible price to the actual consumer.

We know in the practical application, not only of things of this kind, but in various other things, that there are often various corporations organized, and one corporation develops and sells to another corporation that will take power over a line 40 or 50 miles, and that corporation sells it to another corporation, and that corporation sells it to another one that distributes it, and all of these overhead charges must be paid; all of this machinery must be oiled. In the end the consumer pays it all. That must necessarily follow. That condition would be relieved or done away with if the Secretary of War, or the person representing the owners of the property where the dam is built—that is, the people of the United States—should say, "We will charge you one rental if you sell to some intermediate corporation, but we will charge you another rental, at a much lower figure, if you will sell directly to the municipality whose citizens it is desired should be supplied with electric light and electric power."

I might go on, Mr. President, and show in a great many instances how this power to charge a rental would be used to regulate the price that the consumer must pay. The first instance I gave will demonstrate, I think, that in many cases where the power developed by the water is going to come into competition with a higher-priced power, they can just as well charge a reasonable fee and let it go to the people of the United States, and the consumer would still pay the same price that he would have to pay if no charge were demanded in the way of a rental by the Government. The only object of it all is to give to the people of the country the widest possible development and the lowest possible price.

Now I want to read an extract from an article written by Mr. Lane, the Secretary of the Interior. He wrote this article with reference to a bill providing for power development of nonnavigable streams on the public lands of the United States, which was pending before the Public Lands Committee, and which has since been reported, and is now on the calendar; and I am only going to read that part of it which applies as well to this bill as to that one. In fact, I am only discussing now the particular question which is before the Senate. There are some other propositions involved in this bill that, in my judgment, are fundamental, and in due time I expect to discuss them. For instance, I expect to discuss the policy of this bill as outlined in section 6, ordinarily referred to as the recapture proposition, and I expect to offer an amendment which will strike out that section and insert a new one. I consider that perhaps more important than the question which is now before the Senate; but that question and this one, in my humble judgment, are fundamental.

The principles underlying each one of those two questions are exactly the same as applied to dams constructed across navigable streams and as applied to dams constructed on streams that are in the public land. While Secretary Lane's article was written with reference to the streams flowing in the public lands of the United States, and not navigable, what he said on that point—on both of those points, in fact, although I will only read one now—applies just as fully to this bill as to that one.

I believe it will be conceded by all that Secretary Lane is one of the best-qualified men to speak on this subject of any man in the United States. There are many others just as good, some of them, perhaps, here in the Senate, but we will all concede that he is one of the public leaders of public thought on important questions that relate to the welfare of the people. No man questions his ability or his honesty, and I think we ought to look with a great deal of respect upon the sober and honest judgment of such a man, especially when he is in the position that he occupies, where he has control on the part of the Government of all the streams flowing through public lands, because he has jurisdiction in his department over all of the public lands of the United States.

What price or consideration should be exacted?

He has been discussing the question of rental, advocating it, and urging that the authority ought to be given to the proper officer to demand it. Now he comes to the price, and in discussing that, as I remember it now, he goes into the policy that ought to be adopted by the Government or an officer if the law gave him the authority to demand a rental such as I have been speaking of. The Secretary says:

> As already intimated, a nominal charge of 5 per cent of the agricultural value of the land would be useless and inadequate and would not justify the trouble and cost of collection.

That applies particularly to the language of the bill as it stands now—that this rental shall be the value of the land as land; and as the Senator from Montana, who makes the motion, has so well pointed out, as a rule this land would have practically no value as land. It would be among the rocks of a stream, and as far as its land value is concerned it would be nil.

But the Secretary goes on:

> The gift of such a resource would not inure to the benefit of the consumer or the general public, but to the promoter. Furthermore, the authorities agree that a charge of some kind should be imposed as a regulative measure. The Government could, if it followed the precedent of private owners, charge not less than 5 per cent of the value of the lands for power purposes; but this would be a heavy charge upon the developer, which he in turn would endeavor to recover from the consumer.

I want to pause there before I read further, because I agree so fully with what he has said there that I want to comment on it just a little.

If it were a private person, as the Secretary says, who had the authority that the Government has to demand any condition that he may see fit before he permits this development, he would demand a charge that would, perhaps, be, as the Secretary says, at least 5 per cent of the value of these lands for power purposes. He would get, in other words, all he could out of it. But that charge, if made on the value of the land for power purposes, would make a sum that I concede and the Secretary concedes, and I think all concede, would be so great that in most instances the man who had to pay it would be compelled to recoup himself by charging a higher price for the product to the consumer.

So we want, on the one hand, not to take from the people of the United States these valuable rights that are worth millions and give them to men who want only to make money out of the project—and I do not find fault with them at all on that account—give them absolutely to them without any recompense to the real owners, the public, and give them to them for a term of 50 years, and, if this bill is not changed, in reality, as I think I will be able to show when that part of the bill comes up, in perpetuity. A valuable right, belonging to all the people, belonging to our children and our children's children, should not be given to people whose only object is to make money for themselves out of it, without some recompense to the owners of the property and to their posterity.

As the Secretary said, no one who asserts that the Secretary has a right to demand a rental value is claiming that we should make this price high, not as high as a private individual would, because, after all, the object is to give to the people of the country the use and benefit of the development of this power and at as low a price as possible. As I said, the only reason why we want to give to the Secretary the right to charge a rental is to put in his hands a power to regulate, although incidentally, in cases like the first instance I gave, it would probably result in quite a large income to the Government.

The Secretary goes on:

> We should charge nothing at first, during the period while the plant is building and finding a market, except perhaps a charge merely sufficient to pay the expenses of administration.

Of course there would be some instances where power would be developed where the market is already there waiting for the power. In that case the charge could commence at once.

> This period of nominal charge might be 5 or 10 years. The charge should then gradually and moderately increase as the years go by according to a scale fixed in the lease or permit at the outset, and in every instance premiums should be put on low rates to the consumer. In other words, the lower the rate to the consumer, the lower should be the charge on the part of the Government.

I think that states it in a nutshell.

> Also some premium should be placed upon the full development of the power possibilities of any given site.

That is another important consideration. Unless there is some power to regulate it will very often occur that men will get possession and the right to develop sites when the real intention is to prevent their full development by somebody else in order to protect the exorbitant prices that they have been, through some other corporation, perhaps, able to charge the consumer in that community.

> The main object, however—

> is to secure development for the benefit of the consumer, and the regulative charge can be readily fixed upon a sliding scale which will go up or down, according to the treatment of the consumer by the producer.

Mr. President, the Secretary has a great deal else to say in this article. Some of it does not apply to this bill and other parts of it apply to another part of the bill. That is all of the Secretary's article I am going to read now. I think he outlines fully, as I in my weak way tried to do, that those who favor giving the power to the Secretary to charge a rental favor it, because they believe that in many instances it will regulate and lower the price that the consumer will have to pay and in other instances it will bring a large amount of money into the Treasury of the United States and not increase the price which the consumer has to pay for the product.

Mr. President, the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] yesterday just before the Senate closed made a very forceful presentation of the other side of this proposition, and in doing so he gave some illustrations. He told us of the development of a power down in Alabama, and if you heard the remarks that he made, or, if you did not, if you will read the RECORD of to-day you will find he said repeatedly that these men under a special act of Congress built a dam in the Coosa River; that they have made the river navigable for 35 miles; that they are paying to the Government $180,000 a year for the privilege of building this dam and making the river navigable.

If you analyze his statement closely, however, you will find that they do not pay the $180,000 or any other amount to the Government. They have a perpetual right, and pay absolutely nothing for it; $180,000 is the interest on the investment at 6 per cent, and if they pay it to anybody it is to Wall Street. In the graphic description the Senator portrayed he showed how these men with their hard-earned cash had gone to the Government and said, "Here, Uncle Sam, we built a dam; it has cost us $3,000,000. We have made this river of yours navigable for 35 miles. Here it is. Take it; it is yours. And to show you we are real patriots we will give you $180,000 a year in addition. It is all yours."

That is philanthropy, Mr. President, with a vengeance. I have wondered about these men who, out of the goodness of their patriotic hearts, have gone out and built that dam and turned it over to the Government, paying the Government $180,000 a year. And, as the Senator from Alabama said, the permit is perpetual; it will never end. It is going to run through all eternity. How are those poor men going to keep up that work? What a sad spectacle that this great Government of ours should sit idly by while Uncle Sam, with his grasping fingers, goes out and makes these people pay. He does not make them. They are willing; they pay it right along, $180,000 a year from now until the end of time, and then some. Will not these poor fellows get out of money? What will they do when they become bankrupt and can not make this payment?

Mr. President, we ought to give some consideration to these men. We gave them a perpetual franchise on the Coosa River. They built a dam there. These men who I presume through many years of toil and strife, walking between the plow handles or by the sweat of their faces earning their bread and their living in the harvest field, or in the mine, or in the factory, after years of this toil accumulated a little money and built a dam and gave it to the Government. Mr. President, there were tears almost in the Senator's voice, and I remember the tender-hearted Senator from California [Mr. WORKS] was moved almost, I thought, in interrupting him to an apology for some objection he had made to the bill just a few minutes before.

We ought to do something for these men. I wondered if we would give them a pension, if it would not be satisfactory. If we would treat them with the same consideration that we do the old soldiers who risked their lives to protect the country and give them $25 or $30 a month, it would assist them in making this payment of $180,000 a year.

Mr. President, Congress ought never to have passed a law that would give to any man or to any corporation a perpetual right that would run as long as the Government stands to dam the navigable streams of this country, especially without holding in its hands somewhere some power or some restraint by which we could regulate the price that such men must charge for the product. It will be found that this dam is a valuable asset. I complain not of the men who built it. I am not finding fault with them. They were and are honorable and engaged in an honorable and legal business. They went into it to make money. They are making money, and the men who will go into it in the future will go into it to make money. We want to pass a law that will be so inviting that it will entice money to invest. I admit that.

But it does not follow, Mr. President, that we should pass a law that would in effect turn over these great rights that ought to belong and in fact are the heritage of all the people to the perpetual use and profit of men who go into it simply for financial gain. There ought to be a power of restraint in the Government that would have a regulatory effect upon the power that is produced, and that would protect the consumer when he buys and consumes the product generated at these water-power dams.

If we provide that the Secretary of War shall have the right to charge a rental value along the line, for instance, indicated by the Secretary of the Interior, Mr. Lane, who can deny but what such power vested in the person who represents the Government would have, as he has outlined there, a good effect upon the regulation of power that shall be developed from these dams?

It seems to me, therefore, Mr. President, that we can not reach any other conclusion than that not only ought the amendment of the Senator from Montana to be adopted and this language stricken out, but there ought to be, and probably will be offered later on, an amendment that would give to the Secretary the right to charge a rental in all cases and give him some discretion in its application. It can not be said that it would be a hardship against the man who gets permission to develop the power because the regulation in regard to rental would be included in his lease. He would have 50 years at least in which no one could interfere with his right under that lease to enjoy the privileges that are given, and then at the close of the 50 years he or his successors would have the right to make a renewal under certain conditions, or if the Government took it over, and that ought to be in the bill, he should be paid for all the expense and all the investment that is fair and just and that he ought to be remunerated for. But this particular provision goes only so far, if it carries, as to give to the Secretary of War the right to exercise a wise discretion in making a lease and charging in the lease a reasonable and a fair rental for the power developed.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I had not intended to discuss the general propositions in the bill at any length. I shall probably submit some remarks hereafter with reference to some amendments that may be offered. But the discussion has taken such a wide range that I think I shall notice some of the general propositions advanced and then submit some remarks in reference to the particular amendment which is now pending.

We have had represented in the discussion thus far the two extremes of this controversy. We have just had from the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] a discussion of the extreme so-called conservation views, and yesterday afternoon we had the extreme position taken on the other side by the Senator from California [Mr. WORKS]. So we have a situation here where there are some Members of the Senate who are disposed to vote against the bill because it does not go far enough and others who propose to vote against it because it goes too far. The result of this situation must be necessarily a compromise. That is the result of all controversies of this kind in a legislative way. Concessions must be made here and concessions made there if we would get anything.

I think it is well to consider the situation we are in now. In 1890 a provision was passed making it an offense to put any obstruction in a navigable stream without the consent of the Secretary of War, or without a special permit at any rate. Under that condition of things very little was done. In 1906 a general law was passed under which permits might be secured from Congress, the permittee being required to comply with the terms of the general act. The act of 1906 was not very successful; there was not very much done under it; but in 1910 the act of 1906 was amended. The act of 1910 was not so liberal even as the act of 1906. Under that a few permits were granted, but very few dams were built.

Finally a controversy arose over the propositions that are now involved in this controversy. The executive department finally concluded that even if Congress should pass an act granting a party a permit to put in a dam under the provisions of the general act, it would not approve such a permit unless a provision were inserted requiring the payment of a charge and also a limitation in time. One or two bills were vetoed, and from that time until now there has been an absolute bar to the inauguration of any of this work, and even the passage of any legislation looking toward permits.

That is the situation which confronts us. Unless we solve it in some way we will have none of this work done. With reference to the situation I think I shall read an extract from the testimony of Secretary Garrison, late Secretary of War, taken before a committee investigating this subject, in which he describes very concisely the condition of things:

> As just said, the first general dam act was that of 1906, which was rewritten in the second or amended general dam act of 1910. The first act was less illiberal than the second, which is the existing law. Whatever may be asserted to the contrary, the department knows, and everybody who has taken the trouble to ascertain the facts also knows, that reasonable development has not taken place under the act. Reasonable development can never take place under the act. The act prohibits it. This is no new discovery. It is conceded by all who have familiarized themselves with the operation of the act. (See final report, National Waterways Commission, S. Doc. No. 469, 62d Cong., 2d sess.) That there have been applications made for permits to erect dams and power structures under the act and granting of the same by Congress does not constitute construction, nor is it any testimony as to the virtues of that act. The real test comes when permittees attempt to raise money under the act. An applicant merely sees an opportunity to develop power and comes to Congress for permission. It costs practically nothing to make such an application. If the financing fails, the permittee loses only his time. The process is a good gamble. It is analogous to paying down money to secure an option on property. The real test of the general dam act lies in the record of what has been accomplished under it.
> Under the first act 25 subsequent enabling acts were passed.

That is, 25 permits from Congress in pursuance of the provisions of the general act.

> Under these enabling acts only 6 plants have been constructed, and the remainder of the permits have lapsed under the time limitations, presumably because the projectors could not finance under the terms of the act. Activity in water-power development throughout the country has increased enormously since 1910, but under the present law, passed in that year, the applications for permits to construct dams on navigable streams have been less in number than they were from 1906 to 1910. Congress, under the 1910 act, has passed only 14 enabling acts, and only 2 power plants have been constructed under them. Reducing the thing to percentages, the percentage constructed under the act of 1906 was 24, while that under the act of 1910 was 14. I have been informed that two of the plants to which I have referred as having been constructed under the act of 1906 were made financially possible because, in one case, of a very large and unusually profitable market which surrounds the risk; and, in the second, the plant was but a small adjunct to a large power system held in fee, and the fee properties were made a lien under the bonds, so the company was placed in a position where it had to have more power or acknowledge its failure to supply its customers. The total capacity of the plants constructed under the acts of 1906 and 1910 is something less than 140,000 horsepower. The past five years have been remarkably active in water-power development in places at sites beyond the jurisdiction of the Federal Government, and better power sites on the navigable streams of the country have been passed over for less available ones not under Federal jurisdiction. I think we have every reason to believe that under reasonable Federal laws there would be a very early development on the navigable waters of the United States of considerably more than a million horsepower.

Mr. President, that shows the condition we are in now. It shows the problem this committee has been trying to solve. We have also recognized the sentiment in the country and the conflicting views with reference to what should be done in order to solve this matter.

I unite with the Senator from Nebraska in conceding freely to those who do not agree with me the utmost honesty and sincerity of purpose in their views. As a matter of fact, we are all seeking the same thing. He quoted from an article prepared by the Secretary of the Interior in which it was stated that the object to be accomplished by this legislation is to bring about the widest possible development of power at the cheapest possible price to the consumer. That is what we are all after; that is what we want; and that is what the committee has honestly tried to do in framing this measure.

There are many provisions in the bill which I would rather not see in it, but I do believe that it is a fair, reasonable measure, and that it will, to a very great extent, accomplish the purpose desired by all. We have endeavored in the bill to get a workable measure; that is, to get one that would induce capital to invest in these great enterprises, because it must be understood that capital can not be compelled to go into these enterprises. We must induce capital to go into them.

The Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] yesterday pointed out the difficulty and the risk and the expense that capital must go to and must assume in undertaking these works, and he did it far better than I could do. But one thing we all know—that we can not compel capital to invest in these plants, and that we must offer inducements satisfactory to capitalists, or we will not get the investment made, the work done, and these great enterprises developed.

Now, the committee has tried to make this bill so that capital will go into these enterprises. I will say that we have assurances from those who represent capital that if the bill is enacted in substantially the present form they will invest in many of these great enterprises. That is what we desire.

We have also desired to respect as nearly as possible and to confine ourselves to the jurisdiction of the National Government, and we have also endeavored to protect the rights of the States and to respect their sovereignty, and, above all, have we endeavored to protect the rights and interests of the consumers of the country.

I sometimes think that those who argue along the lines of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] overlook the interest of the consumers of the country in the desire to get some money into the Federal Treasury or to make the man who puts his money into these propositions pay something. The Senator from Nebraska referred to the enterprise indicated by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD], wherein the Senator from Alabama said that these people pay to the National Government $180,000 a year. Where did that money come from? That money came from the consumers of the power.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. JONES. Certainly, I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I suppose the Senator did not hear me say that, as a matter of fact, from an analysis of the statement made by the Senator from Alabama, the people building the dam do not pay the Government anything. The $180,000 represents the interest on the amount they invested in the building of the dam. They do not pay anything to the Government, as a matter of fact.

Mr. JONES. Then, of course, if they do not pay anything, that amount is not taken from the consumer.

Mr. NELSON. But, according to the statement of the Senator from Alabama, the Government got 35 miles of navigable water they did not have before.

Mr. JONES. Yes; and probably the Senator from Alabama can point out other things that the Government got.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. JONES. Certainly.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I stated that the improvement made by the company has cost them $3,000,000. They have expended $3,000,000 in constructing the dam, which made navigation as complete as possible on that river for 35 miles. They turned all that over to the Government for its use. My suggestion was that they were paying an interest of $185,000 on the structure and that the Government was getting the benefit of the whole of it.

Mr. JONES. The Senator from California [Mr. WORKS] criticized the bill on yesterday and pointed out wherein he thinks the bill invades the jurisdiction of the States. I think there is no disagreement between the Senator from California and myself with reference to the desirability of respecting the sovereign rights of the States and of the Federal Government. I do not want the Federal Government to invade the rights of the States at all. There are some provisions in the bill that, as I said, I should like to have left out, largely because of what I think is, to a certain extent, an invasion of the rights of the States; but I do not believe that the bill goes anything like as far as the Senator from California contends.

What does the bill do? The bill grants the right to construct dams in navigable streams. It is not the Secretary of War that gives the right. As a matter of course we give it by the bill, but we say that it shall not be granted except upon the compliance of the permittee with certain conditions laid down in the bill itself as our legislative act. We say that the United States authorizes any of the persons as hereinafter defined to construct, maintain, and operate a dam in navigable streams after obtaining the permit of the Secretary of War as hereinafter provided, and we specify what the conditions of that permit shall be. So, while, of course, there is nothing in the bill that compels the Secretary of War to grant a permit, yet as an administrative officer he will certainly endeavor to carry out the purposes and intention of the act, and he must act within the limits of the powers defined in the grants made by the act.

The Senator from California, I understand, contends that the Secretary of War has authority over irrigation and power and all that sort of thing. I do not think so. This is what we do. We grant the right after they have received a permit from the Secretary of War to construct dams for navigation for the development of power or other purposes.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. JONES. Certainly.

Mr. WORKS. The Senator concedes that the Secretary of War is authorized to impose the conditions upon which the right to construct a dam is founded.

Mr. JONES. I am going to point out just what we do provide.

Mr. WORKS. But if the Secretary of War is authorized to impose those conditions, and they are different conditions from those imposed by the States, in order to secure the same right to the use of the water, that would be an infringement of the right of the State, would it not?

Mr. JONES. I think so, but I will try to point out a little different position from that under the act. We find this situation throughout the country. Here are great power possibilities in navigable streams by the construction of a dam that is necessary to take care of the navigation. There are many other potential possibilities that would not be cared for, while if a dam were required to be constructed of such a capacity as to develop power that could be used not only for navigation purposes but for other purposes, great good would be conserved. For instance, we have many places where, in addition to getting navigation, we can develop power for manufacturing purposes. If the dam is put in only for navigation, manufacturing purposes are not developed and are not conserved. Here is another place where not only manufacturing plants could be established, but, as out in our part of the country, thousands of acres of desert land could be irrigated and great wealth created by the construction of a dam of proper height developing a sufficient amount of power. If that is not taken into account, there is a great natural resource that is practically wasted. We have taken that into account in this bill; and we think that, wherever in a navigable stream there are power possibilities, such a construction should be had as will make available power necessary for the development of all these other industries, but we do not give to the Secretary of War the power to say what industries shall be developed or how they shall be developed. We do not give him any control over them at all. All we do is to give him the power to require certain conditions with reference to the building of a dam, and he can not go any further than that.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. JONES. Yes; I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WORKS. I disagree with the Senator upon that point, and I am a little bit afraid that he is allowing the necessities of his constituents to influence his judgment with respect to the constitutional questions that are involved in this inquiry. I should like, however, to ask the Senator whether he sees any reason why there should not be a plain and simple provision in the bill authorizing the Secretary of War to grant the right to construct dams of this kind, imposing only such conditions as would protect and preserve the navigability of the stream without imposing conditions that really affect the disposition and use of the water.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I do not believe that under this bill we give the Secretary of War any power with reference to the disposition and use of the water.

Mr. WORKS. Very well. I am asking the question from my own point of view, and I ask the Senator for an answer from that point of view.

Mr. JONES. Well, probably if I were to answer from that point of view, I might have the same opinion as has the Senator, but I do not think that is the viewpoint of the bill.

Mr. WORKS. Then, why should there be a provision in the bill that would raise such a controversy with respect to its meaning as it is now presented to the Senate, when it could be made perfectly clear?

Mr. JONES. Well, Mr. President, I confess that I may be influenced somewhat by the necessities of my constituents and the necessity of conserving a great many of the great natural resources all over the country. I want to conserve those if we possibly can do so. I believe they could be conserved properly under the suggestion made by the Senator from California; but I do not believe we can possibly pass legislation of that kind. I want legislation under which we can get development. I am not one of those—and I do not say that the Senator from California is one of those, for I do not think he is—I am not one of those who insist upon a certain plan, a certain course, and certain legislation, or nothing; but if I can get legislation framed in what I think is a practical way, just as near the lines of what I think it ought to be, I am going to stand for it, unless it is clearly contrary to the Constitution.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, take the case which the Senator illustrates. I am very much interested in the argument which the Senator from California [Mr. WORKS] has been making, but I confess I have not yet seen the force of it. An improvement for the benefit of navigation is clearly a matter of Federal regulation. As I understand it, if, in addition to the improvement of navigation, power may be developed so far as the dam in cases of a literal improvement of navigation is concerned, it can only be built under Federal authority; and you have to go to the Federal Government for that authority.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, I tried to explain yesterday what my views were upon that subject.

Mr. CLAPP. I know the Senator from California did.

Mr. WORKS. Of course, you have to go to the Secretary of War for authority; but here, I will say to the Senator from Minnesota, this bill is seeking to do something more than to secure that authority under which the Secretary of War should exercise his jurisdiction to protect navigation; and it undertakes to give him the right to impose conditions that affect the distribution, use, and application of the water itself, which does not belong to the Government.

Mr. CLAPP. I understand those matters are left to the State.

Mr. WORKS. They are left to the State in this bill.

Mr. CLAPP. Of course, some control has got to be in the Congress. It may be delegated to the Secretary of War. When you add to the improvement that is necessary for navigation, an additional burden, you have got, so far as the exercise of that additional burden is related in its effect upon and to navigation, to leave that with Congress, delegated by Congress, of course, to the Secretary of War. I have not yet seen where this bill goes beyond that in the exercise of what is in the improvement in excess of that required for navigation. I should like to see that pointed out, if it is in the bill.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, this illustrates the difference of opinion that arises over legal construction and shows what differences of opinion we have among lawyers. I remember several years ago, when this controversy was on, that I introduced a resolution in the Senate directing the Judiciary Committee of the Senate to make a report with reference to the jurisdiction of the Federal Government and the jurisdiction of the State governments upon these very propositions, in the hope that, if we got a report from that body of great lawyers, giving their opinion definitely as to the respective powers of the States and of the National Government, we should have no trouble, then, in framing our legislation. That resolution stayed with that committee for quite a good while, and they wrestled with it; but they were not able to agree among themselves. The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] prepared a splendid and exhaustive report, giving his views with reference to the matter; the Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN], and the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON], I think, also prepared a report.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Washington yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. JONES. Certainly.

Mr. NELSON. The report to which the Senator from Washington refers was a report of a subcommittee consisting of the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON], the then Senator from New York [Mr. Root], and myself; and it was a report that the subcommittee unanimously agreed to.

Mr. JONES. I am glad the Senator states that, for I did not know that the subcommittee had unanimously agreed. I thought the report was largely the report of the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. NELSON. No; it was the report of the subcommittee, and they were unanimous.

Mr. JONES. Then the Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN] and the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] joined in a report, but the full committee never made any report; they could not apparently reach an agreement. So the whole controversy was again relegated to discussion in the Senate, and we have it here with us.

Where there is this great difference of opinion with reference to our legal powers and our legal rights, I am going to resolve any doubts that I may have in favor of doing what I think will conserve our great natural resources and bring about the greatest development; and that is what I think this bill does.

Now, I want to call the attention of the Senator from Minnesota to just what we say about this. We say that the United States authorizes any person to construct a dam—I am leaving out many words, but this is the idea—for the development and improvement of navigation. That is clearly within our power; but as I said a while ago, there are places where far more power can be developed than is necessary for navigation, and that power can be used for various purposes. Congress is the only authority that can give consent to put that dam in the stream. We can withhold that consent—we have that power—and we have the right to do it, so far as that is concerned. In the exercise of that authority it seems to me that it is fair and right and just and within our power to require that the dam be built in such a way as to develop the highest possible water development at that place, no matter what the power may be used for. So we say "and for water power or other purposes." We do not say how the power shall be used; we do not say whether this power after it is developed shall be used for irrigation or for manufacturing or for any other purpose; but we simply say, as a condition to putting this dam across this stream, that the dam shall be constructed so as to bring about the greatest possible development. I believe that is not only within our rights as well as our power, but that it is also within our duty.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. JONES. I yield.

Mr. CLAPP. I think it would be plainer, perhaps, to the layman if, instead of saying that the Government must consent, we should say that, independent of navigation, no dam could be placed at all without the consent of Congress or of the Federal Government. That being true, what infringement is there in it of the right of a State for the Federal Government, independent now of any navigation purpose, to insist that when the Federal Government does consent to the damming of a river within the jurisdiction of Congress that river shall be of the highest efficiency at that point? I can not see, for the life of me, how that invades the rights or the prerogatives of the States. Beyond that, as I understand, it does not go. The power can be used for any purpose they see fit.

Mr. JONES. That is true.

Mr. CLAPP. The extent of the so-called interference is that, as a prerequisite to the consent, the plan must involve the most complete use of the water at that point for power, supercharged in this case upon the improvement, and its use for navigation. Is not that the correct view?

Mr. JONES. Yes; the Senator has simply placed my point in a little different way and much clearer than I did; and I am very glad indeed that he has done so, because that is the situation and that is the point I am trying to make.

Mr. CLAPP. Well, now, if that is true, are we not getting somewhat far afield in the discussion, or bringing in here the question of the relative power of the States and the Federal Government, for clearly no one will question that a dam could not be placed upon a navigable water without or against the consent of the Federal Government?

Mr. JONES. Well, some of our great legal lights do not look at in that way. They see that it is an invasion of State sovereignty; but I do not so see it.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. JONES. I do.

Mr. NELSON. If the Senators will allow me, I wish to call their attention to the proviso on page 2, showing how carefully the rights of the public are guarded as well as the rights of the States, and the fact that the use of the water power is not limited merely to electrical purposes. Here is the proviso:

Provided, That when the power to be developed by the project and improvement of the stream for navigation is used or to be used for a public-utility purpose or purposes the grantee must be a municipal corporation, or a political subdivision, or other agencies of a State, or a public-service agent of a State, or a public-utility corporation created and organized under the laws of a State or the United States, authorized to engage in the business of furnishing water, heat, or electric energy for public or private use.

Could there be anything stronger than that? That language shows that the corporation created must be one created by the State and equipped with that special power.

Mr. JONES. We do not limit in any way the manner in which this power shall be used after the dam is constructed, but we simply say that a dam of a certain kind may be constructed by a certain qualified grantee; and that is all there is to it; at least, that is the way I look at it.

Mr. CLAPP. And that authority can not be granted by any other power except the Federal Government?

Mr. JONES. No.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Washington if he does not think that, under the provisions of this bill, whenever power is created or electric current is created, the very moment it leaves the switchboard it becomes subject to the laws of and subject to regulation by the State through its commission?

Mr. JONES. I do, absolutely.

Mr. BANKHEAD. There is no question about that.

Mr. JONES. And all the accessory works and the dam itself, after they are built, are the property of the grantee and subject to the control of the State, so far as taxation and purposes of that kind are concerned.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Absolutely; and that settles the whole question.

Mr. JONES. Absolutely. You can not find anything anywhere in this bill to the contrary.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. JONES. Certainly.

Mr. SHIELDS. There is provision not only that all the property shall be subject to the laws of the State, but even that the business of the company shall likewise be subject to the laws of the State, so as to make it just as much subject to the laws of the State as is any citizen of the State.

Mr. JONES. Certainly; that is correct.

Now, I want to call attention to what the conditions are which we say the Secretary of War must put in the permit. We do not leave it to his discretion at all, but we say that the Secretary of War must put in the permit these conditions: First. The plans and specifications for the dam, showing the location, so as to give a full understanding of the subject, and they must have been submitted to the Chief of Engineers, and when the plans and specifications are approved they become a part of the permit. I see nothing there to invade the rights and powers of the States.

Second. The project adopted—

That is, the character and extent of the dam that is to be constructed for the impounding of the water—including the plans, specifications, and location for any dam and accessory work, shall be such as, in the judgment of the Secretary of War, shall be best adapted to a comprehensive plan for the improvement of the waterway in question for the uses of navigation and for the full development of its water power, and for other beneficial public purposes.

We can not determine in our legislation how high a dam must be or how long it must be, and so we must leave some discretion to somebody to ascertain the facts and all the conditions surrounding the proposed development; but we do say—and I think we can properly say—that before any dam shall be built in a navigable stream the plans must show that that dam will be sufficient to subserve not only the interests of navigation but any other interests that may be developed under it.

We can not leave that to anybody more appropriately than to the Secretary of War, who has his Engineer Corps to investigate. So the Secretary of War, in determining the character of the dam necessary to take care of all possible development, must do it within the limits laid down by this legislation; in other words, we fix the standard that must control the Secretary of War; and there is nothing in it that invades the powers of the States, for we do not say to him "You can control the disposition of the power developed for manufacturing purposes or for irrigation purposes or for anything of that kind." All that we say to him is that "You shall see that the plans for the dam shall be such that when the dam is constructed it will furnish the greatest possible power development." It then falls on the laws of the State absolutely. That is the extent of the power of the Secretary of War. It does not go any further than granting the permit for the construction of the dam, except possibly, in one or two instances later on, to which I may hereafter refer.

Third. As a part of the conditions of this permit the Secretary of War shall put certain things in it, for instance:

(a) That this grantee shall preserve navigation facilities.

Nobody can object to that. It further requires that the locks shall be constructed and turned over to the Government free. That is in the interest of navigation.

(b) That such grantee shall furnish power free to the Government to operate the lock—

Not for any other purposes. Then, in case the navigation facilities shall not be a part of the original plan, that shall be taken care of afterwards.

It also provides that the grantee shall reimburse the United States for the investigation of these plans. There is no invasion there of the rights of the States.

Then it is provided that such grantee shall pay a reasonable charge in consideration of the benefits that may accrue to him by the operation and maintenance of reservoirs and other works which the Government may put in, which may result in maintaining a permanent flow of water from which he gets the benefit for his other power. There is no invasion there and no charge there for anything that is not clearly within the jurisdiction of the United States.

Then, if the public lands are included within the lands which are overflowed, they may be taken, and the Secretary of War may grant a permit for the use of the lands.

Then we go on to put in a provision that there shall be reasonable charges for the use of this land based upon its value as land.

If I had my way about it, I would strike out every word in that proviso from the word "ten," in line 20, on that page, in these words:

And for any land of the United States so used and occupied the grantee shall pay to the United States such reasonable charges, based upon its value as land, as may be fixed by the Secretary of War; and in fixing such charges—

I would cut all that out. I would not charge a man who is going to put his money into a great enterprise like this a single dollar for one foot of Government land that may be overflowed and which may be necessary in the development of this great industry; and I would do that, not in the interest of the grantee, but in the interest of the consumers, who have to pay for the power which they get.

I will refer to that proposition a little bit later on, but I thought right here I would simply state briefly my position, because every dollar which the grantee has to pay as a legitimate expense must be allowed by any public-service commission in the fixing of rates. So, when our friends on the other side contend for the imposition of a tax, it seems to me that they are simply contending for the imposition of a burden upon the consumer. I want the consumers of the country to get this power and this service just as cheaply as possible; in other words, in accordance with the statement read by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] from the article by Secretary Lane, I want this power developed at the lowest possible price to the consumer. How you can lower the price by imposing a tax I have never yet been able to figure out, and yet that is what those who contend for the levying of a tax, in my judgment, necessarily do. They must increase the cost to the consumer.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. JONES. Certainly.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, the Senator from Washington, I dare say, recognizes that in granting a franchise by municipalities in our day and age the grantee of the franchise is ordinarily required to pay something into the Public Treasury as a consideration for the franchise. Is that not correct?

Mr. JONES. That may be true.

Mr. WALSH. In the same way that goes to increase the cost to the consumer, does it not?

Mr. JONES. I think so.

Mr. WALSH. How, then, does the Senator account for the general acquiescence in that policy?

Mr. JONES. I do not account for it; I do not justify it.

Mr. WALSH. Does the Senator think it is wrong?

Mr. JONES. Where there is a regulative body to fix the rate to be charged by the grantee of a franchise, so that those who use its product are assured, just as nearly as they can be assured, the lowest possible rates and best possible service, I do not think there ought to be a charge.

Mr. WALSH. Then let me ask the Senator whether he is familiar with the arrangement under which the subways in New York City are now operated?

Mr. JONES. No; I am not, except in a general way.

Mr. WALSH. Or the street railways in the city of Chicago?

Mr. JONES. I do not see the pertinency of these suggestions to my argument.

Mr. WALSH. The Senator knows, does he not, that both of those corporations pay a large fund annually into the treasury in consideration of the privileges they enjoy?

Mr. JONES. I suppose so, but I do not think that the people benefit nearly so much from that as they would from a lower-priced service.

Mr. WALSH. My question was simply to bring out the fact that there was nothing extraordinary about this matter at all.

Mr. JONES. I do not dispute that.

Mr. WALSH. And that the public view at the present time is that public-utility organizations ought to return something to the Public Treasury.

Mr. JONES. But there is a different condition there from that obtaining here. In the cases to which the Senator has referred those who get the service are about the only ones who are affected, and they also get the full benefit of the charge imposed. It is entirely different in the case of water-power development. The tax that you propose to levy upon a number of these people may go a thousand miles away or 500 miles away. They may get no benefit from it themselves at all.

Mr. WALSH. I fully agree with the Senator as to that; and an amendment which I submitted awhile ago proposes that whatever may be realized shall go into a fund for the improvement of the stream; I think it might go to improve the very stream from which the revenues are derived.

Mr. JONES. It would be absolutely unjust otherwise, and might be unjust even in that case.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. JONES. I will yield in just a moment. Take the point the Senator has just brought out; take one river in my State, where they have this power development. You put a tax on, and the people who pay that tax will not get any benefit from the navigation improvement of that stream, because it will be clear outside of their territory. I do not think that is just; I do not think it is fair to a man who is trying to develop a farm on sagebrush land to impose upon him a tax to improve a portion of the stream that will be of no benefit to him. Now I yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. SHIELDS. I should like to ask the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], in connection with his reference to the fact that the street railway companies in New York pay annually into the city treasury a considerable sum of money, upon what ground is that payment made? Is it a privilege tax, a payment for the franchise?

Mr. WALSH. It is for the privilege of occupying the public streets and property underneath the surface of the streets.

Mr. SHIELDS. And the franchise of operating a street railway upon those streets?

Mr. WALSH. I suppose so.

Mr. SHIELDS. Is not that the real ground?

Mr. WALSH. That is the real ground, as I understand.

Mr. SHIELDS. A franchise?

Mr. WALSH. Yes, sir.

Mr. SHIELDS. In the same connection, I will ask the Senator from Montana if he approves the public-land bill that has been reported?

Mr. WALSH. In its general features, I do.

Mr. SHIELDS. There is a provision in that bill for the payment of rents on public lands occupied, the rents to go into the Public Treasury, and immediately to be paid out, one half to the State wherein the improvements are located and the other half into the irrigation fund, which is, of course, within practically the same States; is it not?

Mr. WALSH. Yes, sir; it is utilized in the same States.

Mr. SHIELDS. The amendment offered to this bill by the Senator was that the revenues which he thought ought to be paid were to be paid into the Treasury as a fund for the improvement of rivers generally.

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. SHIELDS. And if the improvement was made upon, say, the Tennessee River in the State of Alabama the revenue derived from it might be used to improve a river in the Senator's State.

Mr. WALSH. It might, under that general provision. I have said to the Senator that it was hurriedly drawn. I should be very glad to amend it so that the improvement should be made upon the very river from which the resources came.

Mr. SHIELDS. Is it not a fact that all the charges that are provided to be paid in this bill were so limited, and the Senator proposed to amend it so as to put them in a general fund?

Mr. WALSH. I do not understand so. The provision was only for the payment of charges for the use of headwater improvements, and all those charges went into a general headwater improvement fund. Those headwater improvements might be made in any river, under the bill, so that I did not disturb that feature by the amendment that I proposed.

Mr. SHIELDS. I think the Senator is mistaken. Under section 10, where provision is made for payment of the excess of water arising from dams built solely by the Government, it is also provided that the fund shall be kept for the maintenance and improvement of that particular river, is it not?

Mr. WALSH. I have not that particular provision of the bill in mind.

Mr. SHIELDS. But the amendment proposed by the Senator was that all charges under this bill should go into a general fund.

Mr. WALSH. I supposed we had disposed of that amendment.

Mr. SHIELDS. The Senator referred to it.

Mr. WALSH. I rose simply to invite the attention of the Senator from Washington to the fact that in this day and age we require public-utility organizations to pay something to the Public Treasury for the privileges they enjoy; and if the Senator will pardon me, I will say that about the only right a city has in its streets is to make use of them for the passage of persons and vehicles over them, just exactly the same as the right of the Government in a navigable stream is to look after navigation. It seems to me the right to occupy a stream with a dam is very similar to the right to occupy a street with a street railway, and therefore it seemed to me that we might very properly apply the modern policy to the grant of a privilege to occupy navigable streams.

Mr. SHIELDS. Now, Mr. President, if the Senator from Washington will bear with me——

Mr. JONES. Certainly.

Mr. SHIELDS. I wish to call attention to a distinction first, in answer to the Senator's last proposition, and then I want to refer to the first one. The cities, the counties, and States that have control of streets and other public highways have no power to rent them. They only have the power to provide for transportation upon them. The Government has the power to regulate commerce upon the streams, but no power to permit anyone to place a dam across them for any other purpose, creating power or anything else. The streams, their beds and waters, belong to the riparian proprietors and the States, and this bill simply permits those proprietors to exercise their ownership and use their own property. The United States controls the right to travel and transport merchandise and passengers over them, but has no other authority over them.

Referring to the first question, the Senator gives the illustration of the street railways in the city of New York. We agree that what the city charges for is the franchise of operating a street railroad upon the streets of the city, just as it charges for other franchises. The city does not charge for use of the streets, but for the business of operating a street railway. That is the basis of the charge. In this case the Government is not charging a franchise fee for the use of its lands. There is a difference between real estate and a franchise, in a franchise tax and taxes on real land. We levy an excise tax or a privilege tax for pursuing a certain business or exercising a certain privilege, an ad valorem tax upon property. The charge proposed is a rent, not of the waters, not of the river, but a rent for the real estate belonging to the Government, and the illustration that has been given is totally inapplicable. The Federal Government has no power to charge for the franchise of developing water power and generating electricity, but the States have such charge and the bill provides for such taxation.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, without examining each of the sections here, I pass over several as to which I can not see myself how they invade the jurisdiction of the State. In section 9 I can see——

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to call attention to section 7, which clearly controverts the position of the Senator from California?

Mr. JONES. Certainly.

Mr. NELSON. Section 7 reads:

That whenever all or any part of the power produced at any dam or diversion structure authorized hereunder is offered or disposed of by the grantee to the public, or for a public-utility purpose, all charges, rates, and service—

Not only charges and rates but the service itself—

by any grantee hereunder shall be subject to regulation in accordance with the laws of the State within which the service is rendered.

So that not only the rates and charges but the character of the service to be rendered are left absolutely under the control of the State.

Mr. JONES. Expressly to the State.

Mr. NELSON. Yes.

Mr. JONES. That is true.

Section 9 places it within the power of the Secretary of War to require the grantee to make development of his works as the demands may make necessary. I can see where that may confer upon the Secretary of War a power that could well be left, after the interest of navigation is taken care of, to the public-service commissions of the States, and probably it is within their authority; but the reason why we put that in is because we do not want this work unduly delayed. We want the dam constructed as rapidly as possible, or at least as rapidly as may be necessary to meet the other developments that may take place in connection with it, and so we put in that provision. Personally I should be glad to see it go out, but we have to harmonize these conflicting views with reference to this legislation.

The Senator from California said that the right for irrigation ought to be a perpetual right and there ought not to be any 50-year limit. I agree with him in that. Of course, when a man gets an irrigation right he ought to have a perpetual right, and I would prefer myself to have no limit of time placed upon these grants. I think this ought to be a permanent proposition. It must be a permanent proposition. As long as the rates to be charged by the grantee are subject to the control of public-service corporations and must be fair, just, and reasonable, what difference does it make if it lasts for a thousand years? After 50 years whoever gets the plant can not charge any more than is just and fair and reasonable. Is it contemplated that we should take it away from the first grantee just because he has had it for 50 years and give it over to somebody else?

But the committee put in this limit of 50 years. Why? Simply because of the great demand and sentiment throughout the country in favor of that proposition. I do not believe, in practical effect, it will injure anybody, because we provide here that whoever takes over this plant, even if it is the Government, must assume all the contracts that have been undertaken by the grantee; and I think that insures the perpetual conduct of this work. So that even with this limitation of 50 years here I think the irrigator gets a perpetual irrigation right.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. JONES. I do.

Mr. WALSH. I ask for information: Was not that provision in the act of 1910?

Mr. JONES. I do not remember whether that was in the act of 1910 or not.

Mr. WALSH. I do not think so.

Mr. SHIELDS. My recollection is that the act of 1910 provides that it shall not be for a term exceeding 50 years.

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. JONES. That may be true. I had forgotten it.

Mr. WALSH. So that in that respect the committee simply adopted the policy which found its expression in law in 1910?

Mr. JONES. If it is in that law, of course that is correct; but my recollection is that one of the great controversies, and the question raised by the President in the veto of these permits, was that they not only did not fix any charge, but they did not fix any limit of time. It may be in the act of 1910, but I very much doubt it.

Mr. SHIELDS. I think the Senator is mistaken as to its not being in it, but it is in the language I have stated. The great objection is that the lease automatically expired in the time limit—if it was 50 years; say, in 50 years—and just left the property all loose, at the mercy of the winds. If the Government did not take it over, and there was no new lease, the owner could do nothing with it, and of course it all went to wreck and ruin and the property was destroyed.

Mr. JONES. Of course, that would be a very unwise provision. Capital could not go in under a proposition of that kind.

Mr. SHIELDS. That is the case under the present law.

Mr. JONES. Industries could not be developed under a proposition of that kind. That, then, is probably one of the reasons why we have not had any development. But I was just noticing the suggestion of the Senator from California with reference to the limitation of irrigation rights, and that is my view of it—that this is, in effect, for all practical purposes, a perpetual right.

I am not going to take up the particular terms of the bill any further and refer to them, except as I may desire to do so a little bit further on.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me?

Mr. JONES. Certainly.

Mr. NELSON. The provision of the act of 1910, as to time, is as follows:

Provided also, That the authority granted under or in pursuance of the provisions of this act shall terminate at the end of a period not to exceed 50 years from the date of the original approval of the project.

Mr. JONES. That shows that the Senator from Tennessee was correct. I had not looked at the act, but I just had my impression from what I knew was the contention along about that time. Of course, that would cause the permittee, along about the time of the termination of his lease, to let his works go down and his service become bad, and would be bad not only for him but also for the public.

Now, Mr. President, I want to come more particularly to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH].

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. JONES. Certainly.

Mr. CUMMINS. Before the Senator passes to that point, I should like his opinion with regard to the rule that is established for ascertaining the value of the property at the end of the period of 50 years, or whenever the permit is terminated by notice.

Mr. JONES. I will say to the Senator that I have not given that special consideration. The Senator in charge of the bill is far better able to construe that provision than I am, and I would prefer to have the Senator from Iowa put his inquiries to him with reference to that.

Mr. CUMMINS. In view of that suggestion, I will defer any discussion of it until later.

Mr. JONES. I have not given that subject special consideration.

Mr. SHIELDS. I shall be very glad to explain it to the Senator at the proper time.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to make an inquiry?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I have been detained from the Senate most of the day. I understand that there were some suggestions made during the morning that the Senate should adjourn this evening instead of taking a recess. I should like to ask whether unanimous consent was given to that proposal.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed that there was only an understanding; not a unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. SMOOT. Unanimous consent was not asked, but it was understood.

Mr. KERN. I will state to the Senator from Missouri that there was no unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. SHIELDS. There was no unanimous consent asked, as I remember; but the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], as I remember, rather addressed the request to me, and I said I would have no objection to it. The request, of course, was made to me as being in charge of this bill. Of course, I could not speak for the Senate, but I did make that statement.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, I do not think there was any unanimous-consent agreement at all, or anything in the nature of it, about adjourning. One or two Senators expressed a desire that the Senate should adjourn; but no agreement of any kind that I can recall was made, and I was here during all the morning business.

Mr. STONE. Of course, I would be reluctant to interfere with any arrangement that was made. I could not if there was any unanimous-consent agreement made, and I would not if I could.

It seems to me that it is very essential that this important bill which the Senator from Tennessee has in charge should be pressed with the greatest urgency and insistence, for I know that there are other very important measures on the eve of being brought into the Senate. A great deal of time has been expended on this bill, and we ought to bring it to a vote and dispose of it. I can not conceive why we should waste two hours or more to-morrow morning in what would probably be, as usual, useless or somewhat random discussion.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. JONES. I do.

Mr. SMOOT. I think the idea of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] and the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] was that we should have a morning hour in order that bills could be introduced and committee reports made. That would not take more than 15 or 20 minutes; but there was no idea expressed here that the full two hours should be expended in morning business, and I do not believe there would be any objection at all, just as soon as the regular morning business is through, to taking up the unfinished business. If the Senator from Tennessee would ask unanimous consent or move to take up the bill, I have no doubt it would be immediately placed before the Senate. I will say to the Senator, however, that this morning at least a half dozen or more Senators offered committee reports and bills, and others were on the floor desiring to do so, and all of it had to be done by unanimous consent; and the thought was to allow a short time for morning business, so that it could be done regularly, and then take up the water-power bill immediately.

There is no desire that I know of, on the part of anybody, to have this bill drag out any longer than necessary. I will say to the Senator, however, that the point in this bill that is now being discussed is the vital point in the bill, and a great many of the amendments that have been offered are dependent upon the amendment now before the Senate. If it fails, many of them, of course, will not be discussed at all.

Mr. STONE. I could not intelligently discuss that point. I do not know enough about it. I simply remarked that it was very important, I think, and evident to every Senator that we ought to get rid of the bill as soon as possible.

Mr. SMOOT. That is true.

Mr. STONE. Now, I should like to ask unanimous consent that we adjourn to-night to meet at the usual hour, 12 o'clock to-morrow, with the understanding that only the ordinary morning business shall be transacted, and that at 12.30 the Senate will resume the consideration of the pending bill.

Mr. SMOOT. Twelve-thirty or before.

Mr. STONE. Or before.

Mr. GALLINGER. Does that mean that only 30 minutes will be given for morning business?

Mr. STONE. Yes.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I think we ought not to agree to that. It was distinctly stated this morning that if no effort was made to secure the consideration of morning business, which I intended to make by motion, if necessary, we would have an adjournment to-night until the usual time. The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] acceded to that. The junior Senator from Georgia——

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, while the Senator from New Hampshire was absent from the Chamber a few moments ago I stated that he had made that request, had addressed it to me as the Senator in charge of the bill, and that I stated that I had no objection to an adjournment. But I will call the Senator's attention to the fact that in the conversation in regard to it, I do not not know whether the Senator from New Hampshire made the statement or some other Senator made the statement that the morning hour might be limited to 30 minutes if an adjournment were taken, and in that way very little time would be lost.

Mr. GALLINGER. I suggested that if we could have 45 minutes this morning that would be satisfactory.

Mr. SHIELDS. I wish to proceed with this bill, and if I had control of the matter I would take a recess and devote all the time to it. I am sorry that it has taken so much time, but I do not think those who favor the bill have consumed all the time. We are very anxious to have the bill before the Senate every minute possible until it is disposed of.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have no responsibility whatever about the legislation of this Congress, and do not assume to speak with the slightest earthly authority; but I want to call the attention of the Democratic side of the Chamber to the situation we are in.

In former sessions we have tried to keep the calendar clear by taking a little time to unobjected cases, a couple of times a week, perhaps. There are nearly 100 bills on the calendar now, and they are accumulating with great rapidity, and apparently no effort is being made to have any action taken in connection with those bills. I would gladly waive that, however, if we could have an understanding that we should transact the ordinary morning business; but I would not like the Senator from Missouri to insist that it should be discontinued at 12.30. I think if the Senator would ask unanimous consent that we should take an adjournment to-night, and transact the ordinary morning business to-morrow, not including the consideration of the calendar, we would all agree to it.

Mr. SHIELDS. I will call the attention of the Senator to the fact that for several days the morning business has not consumed as much as 30 minutes.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think that is likely so, and I think for that reason it will not take more than 30 minutes to-morrow, but it might do so.

Mr. SHIELDS. And I should like further, in speaking about the time this bill has consumed, to call attention to the fact that other matters have been injected into it. Even to-day at least two hours and a half, or perhaps three hours, were devoted to the child-labor bill. Of course the friends of the bill are not responsible for that.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator from Tennessee has been very courteous in all matters of that kind. I stated this morning that the bill had been before the Senate for 17 days—I think that is correct; possibly 18—but it is true that the entire time has not been consumed in the discussion of the pending bill.

My anxiety about the matter is that there does not seem to be any reason for us to hope that the bill is ever going to be finally disposed of. It is dragging along; long speeches are being made; a pile of proposed amendments is accumulating; and I confess that as a member of the minority, hoping that we may get a short time for recreation this summer, I have been solicitous that we might not get through until the snow flies next fall. I understand that another power bill, or a bill of that nature, is to follow the one that is now under consideration, and, if the newspapers are correct, that is going to result in a very long debate. But, however that may be——

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I understand that another power bill will follow this one, and one of much more importance than this one, in my opinion.

Mr. GALLINGER. I inferred that was so, from what the newspapers said.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Senator from Montana does not mean that it is certain to follow this bill. He means that he wants it to follow this bill.

Mr. SHIELDS. I do not know whether the other power bill is going to follow this bill or not. I am not interested in that bill, but I do not agree that it is a more important measure than this one. I wish to say to the Senator from New Hampshire, however, that the Senator in charge of this bill is not responsible for the 40 or 50 amendments that have been offered to it.

Mr. GALLINGER. No; certainly not.

Mr. SHIELDS. And further, in regard to the pending bill being before the Senate for 17 days, I will state that it has been laid aside for other matters continually, and in fact not more than 4 or 5 days at the outside have been devoted to the consideration of the bill, notwithstanding the strenuous efforts of the friends of the bill to keep it before the Senate.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, we ought not to consume much time in this discussion. If it is agreeable to the Senator, I will ask unanimous consent that when the session of the Senate closes to-day it adjourn until noon to-morrow, and that the ordinary routine morning business shall be transacted, and only that, and that at its conclusion the consideration of the unfinished business shall be resumed.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think that will be satisfactory.

Mr. SHIELDS. I shall be glad to have that done.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, before consent to that is given I desire to say a word that may bring some reassurance to the Senator from New Hampshire touching the other water-power bill. One of the Senators here a few moments ago stated the fact that the controverted questions in both the bills are very largely the same, and the discussion which is now going on develops very well the line-up upon those questions, so that if the other bill shall follow immediately, as I hope very sincerely it will, and as it ought, I feel perfectly certain that the discussion of it will proceed with very much greater rapidity than the discussion of this bill has proceeded, for, as a matter of fact, the points upon which the differences will develop are substantially the same.

I desire to say now that I am speaking about this matter that I should regard it as exceedingly unfortunate if the discussion of the other bill were put off until some time in the future when all this discussion will have been forgotten and it will be necessary again in the consideration of that bill to traverse the path over which we have progressed in the discussion of this measure with so much labor. If we should go to the consideration of other important measures, the military bills, the appropriation bills, and then come back to that bill after a lapse of 30 or 60 days, everyone will appreciate that everything we have gone over must be gone over again. So I sincerely trust that we shall go on with that bill, and I feel like giving to the Senator from New Hampshire the assurance that in all probability it will progress with reasonable rapidity.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I should like to suggest that we might meet earlier or hold in session later. It seems to me that the amount of time we have consumed on two measures suggests the advisability of staying in session longer and pressing the measures more continuously. I am interested and have charge of a measure which is the first on the calendar. We had it up one morning, and my understanding was, and I thought it was the general understanding, that it was to be taken up each morning, but instead of pursuing that course we recessed. Now, if another power bill is to come in next, and then some other bill——

Mr. SHEPPARD. If the Senator will permit me, he must not forget that there is still another water-power bill to be considered, the bill for prohibition in the District of Columbia.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I think some regard ought to be had to the place where a bill stands on the calendar. If the measure which I have reported to the Senate were to follow the other measures on the calendar, I would concede their right to take precedence. I did not endeavor to press the measure until it became first on the calendar, but now that it is there I think it but right to press it and to insist on it, and not with perfect amiability to yield to a different direction.

Mr. STONE. Will the Chair please state the request for unanimous consent so that it may be understood?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri asks unanimous consent to take up after the routine morning business to-morrow Senate bill 3331——

Mr. STONE. If the Chair will permit me, the request I have made, I think, was not stated quite fully by the Chair. My request was this, that when the Senate closes to-day's session it adjourn until noon to-morrow, and that no business whatever shall be transacted except ordinary routine morning business, and that at the close of that business the Senate will resume the consideration of the unfinished business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri makes a request for unanimous consent as stated by him. Is there objection?

Mr. VARDAMAN. The roll should be called.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears no objection to the request of the Senator from Missouri, and without objection it is so ordered.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I make the point of order that before any unanimous-consent agreement can be entered into the roll has to be called.

Mr. SHAFROTH. That is when unanimous consent is asked to take a vote on a bill.

Mr. SMOOT. On a bill or joint resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is of the opinion that the rule applies only to a vote on the passage of a bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is right.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending question is on the amendment of the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], on which the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] has the floor.

Mr. STONE. I will ask the Senator who has the floor if it would be convenient for him to postpone his remarks until to-morrow?

Mr. JONES. That course will be entirely agreeable to me.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, February 24, 1916.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

We bless Thee, Infinite Spirit, our heavenly Father, that the door to the holy of holies is ever ajar, that those who will may enter in and receive the touch of infinite wisdom, love, and purity which reveals the broader view of life and inspires to nobler living and greater usefulness. Touch us, we beseech Thee, with Thy holy spirit that we may be prepared for the duties, great or small, which we shall be called upon to fulfill in the providence of Thy plans and purposes to-day and always. In the spirit of the Master. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SPARKMAN, by direction of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, reported the bill (H. R. 12193) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes, which was read the first and second time, and, with the accompanying report (No. 254), referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I reserve all points of order on the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington reserves all points of order on the bill.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the minority may have five days in which to file their views.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] asks unanimous consent that the minority may have five days within which to file their views. Is there objection?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to give notice that I desire to call up this measure as soon as possible. I do not know when it can be reached, but I would like to call it up after the Post Office appropriation bill is disposed of and such other measures as may be before the House. I understand there is one before the House that comes up under a rule, and if I can get it up before that time I would like to do so.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that the Chair will first recognize the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS], to call up the legislative appropriation bill, when the opportunity arises.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Speaker, I merely want to suggest that I hope no such time will be granted, under unanimous consent, as will interfere with the taking up of the bill at the proper time.

The SPEAKER. The Chair can assure the gentleman that that will not occur within five days. Is there objection to the gentleman from Washington having five days in which to file minority views? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 10484, the Post Office appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the Post Office appropriation bill, with Mr. RAINEY in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For pay of rural carriers, substitutes for rural carriers on annual leave, clerks in charge of rural stations, and tolls and ferriage, Rural Delivery Service, and for the incidental expenses thereof, $53,000,000: Provided, That not to exceed $20,000 of the amount hereby appropriated may be used for the compensation of clerks in charge of rural stations.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 27, after line 6, amend by adding the following as a new paragraph:

"That the Rural Free Delivery Mail Service shall be extended as rapidly as practicable, so as to furnish as nearly as possible all the rural population of the United States with daily mail delivery, excepting Sundays and legal holidays. That in the reorganization of existing routes and in the establishment of new routes it shall be the duty of the Postmaster General of the United States to furnish as nearly as practicable an every-day, all-the-year-around service, excepting Sundays and legal holidays, to every family in all rural communities, except as provided in this act. That in the reorganization of such service and in the extension thereof such service shall mean delivery by the carrier at the home of each family on such route wherever practicable. That when in individual instances such delivery at the home is impracticable, such service may be effected by delivery at road intersections when the distance is not more than one-half mile from the place of delivery to the home of said family. Such service, however, shall not be considered as a compliance with law except in exceptional instances, and it shall be the duty of the Postmaster General to furnish, as far as possible, delivery of mail at the home of each family on all rural routes now established or which hereafter shall be established.

That hereafter rural mail routes shall be divided into two classes, to be known as—

(a) Standard horse-drawn vehicle rural mail routes, and

(b) Standard motor-vehicle rural mail routes.

That a standard horse-drawn vehicle rural mail route shall be 24 miles in length. That the Postmaster General in the reorganization of existing routes and in the establishment of new routes where a daily delivery is practicable and where dirt roads constitute the major portion of the route to be traveled shall approximate such routes to such standard.

That a standard motor-vehicle rural mail route shall be 50 miles in length. That the Postmaster General, in the reorganization of existing routes and in the establishment of new routes where hard-surfaced roads are available or hereafter shall be established, and where a daily mail service is practicable by motor delivery, shall approximate such routes to such standard. That no standard motor-vehicle route shall be established which shall be less than 40 miles in length.

That where existing rural routes are now established on dirt roads and such routes exceed the standard horse-drawn vehicle route by 20 per cent or more, the Postmaster General is directed to reorganize such routes to conform aproximately to the length of such standard horse-drawn vehicle routes, to wit, 24 miles. That where existing rural routes are now established on hard-surfaced roads and such routes exceed the standard motor-vehicle routes by 20 per cent or more the Postmaster General is hereby directed to reorganize such routes to conform approximately to the length of such standard motor-vehicle routes, to wit, 50 miles.

That in cases where daily service on standard horse-drawn vehicle routes has been established, and an average of less than 3,000 pieces of mail per month are handled for three consecutive months, the service shall be reduced to a triweekly service. That daily service shall be established and maintained on standard horse-drawn vehicle routes wherever in the reorganization of routes or the establishment of new routes an average of 3,000 or more pieces of mail per month will be handled for three consecutive months. That wherever a triweekly service has been established and an average of 3,000 or more pieces of mail per month have been handled for three consecutive months, such triweekly service shall be increased to daily service.

That in cases where daily service on standard motor-vehicle routes has been established and an average of less than 6,000 pieces of mail per month are handled for three consecutive months, the service shall be reduced to a triweekly service. That daily service shall be established and maintained on such standard motor-vehicle routes wherever in the reorganization of routes or the establishment of new routes an average of 6,000 or more pieces of mail per month will be handled for three consecutive months. That wherever a triweekly service has been established and an average of 6,000 or more pieces of mail per month have been handled for three consecutive months, such triweekly service shall be increased to daily service.

That on standard horse-drawn vehicle rural mail routes 24 miles in length the rural mail carrier shall receive an annual salary of $1,200, to be paid monthly. For every mile above said 24 miles or major fraction thereof the carrier shall receive the sum of $30 in addition to said annual salary. For every mile or major fraction thereof below said 24 miles the annual salary of the carrier shall be reduced in the sum of $30.

That on standard motor-vehicle rural mail routes 50 miles in length the rural mail carrier shall receive an annual salary of $1,800, to be paid monthly. For every mile above said 50 miles or major fraction thereof the carrier shall receive in addition to said annual salary the sum of $30. For every mile or major fraction thereof below said 50 miles the annual salary of the carrier shall be reduced in the sum of $30.

That on standard horse-drawn vehicle routes and on standard motor-vehicle routes, in cases where a triweekly service has been established, the salary of the carrier for such triweekly service shall be one-half the amount that would accrue to such carrier if the service had been a daily service, as provided in sections 9 and 10 of this act.

That nothing herein contained shall be construed to prevent the use of motor vehicles on standard horse-drawn vehicle rural mail routes now existing or which hereafter shall be established.

That all acts or parts of acts, and all executive orders issued by the Postmaster General, or under his authority, which are inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

Mr. MOON (interrupting the reading of the foregoing). Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the proposed amendment.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, the amendment has not yet been completely read. I do not insist that it shall be read, if it may be placed in the RECORD, and I ask unanimous consent that the further reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that the further reading of the amendment be dispensed with. Is there objection?

Mr. MOON. I do not object, but it is understood that the point of order is made on the whole amendment.

Mr. TOWNER. Certainly, with the understanding also that the full amendment will be printed. I will now ask the gentleman in charge of the bill if he will withhold the point of order until we can have some debate upon this Rural Delivery Service?

Mr. MOON. I will do so, if we can have unanimous consent to take up, first, an amendment proposed by the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. SULLOWAY], as there will be no discussion about it.

Mr. TOWNER. Very well.

Mr. MOON. Then we can fix some time for debate.

Mr. TOWNER. That is satisfactory.

Mr. MOON. Then, Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 27, line 4, before the word "Provided" insert:

"That the maximum yearly salary shall be paid to the rural carrier on Lake Winnepesaukee, who furnishes his own equipment."

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I will state to the House that this provision has been carried heretofore in the bill, except in the last bill, when it was left out inadvertently. The gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. SULLOWAY] understands the situation fully, and inasmuch as this matter has been carried heretofore, and as that seems to be a very arduous service, which takes the whole time of the carrier, and the service is altogether by boat, I think it should be agreed to.

Mr. CAMPBELL. This applies to only one rural route?

Mr. MOON. Yes; to one rural route.

Mr. CAMPBELL. That is up in New Hampshire?

Mr. MOON. Yes. It is extra hazardous and arduous work. I yield to the gentleman from New Hampshire.

Mr. SULLOWAY. Mr. Chairman, this route is the first water rural-mail route ever established in this country. At the time this service was begun on Lake Winnipesaukee, where there are some 350 or 360 named islands, there were a very limited number of people on them, because there was no way of communication or of getting provisions or anything else. With the establishment of this route business increased and land went up to a high rate per foot, or whatever it may be measured by, and people gathered in there until there are now over 2,000 homes on these islands. They are cottages for summer homes. There are also a number of hotels, summer schools, and camps, and probably 20,000 or 25,000 people are on those islands during the summer months. This route is very profitable to the Government. This carrier has built his own boat. I am not familiar with boat building, but I have been on the boat, and I want to say it must have cost him at least $6,000. It is really not adapted to any other purpose, being built with a postal station, and he carries tons and tons of mail. There is a city from which he starts his boat—Laconia, N. H.—with over 10,000 population. It is a manufacturing town and a stirring business community. This carrier operates, I think, some six months or more, and during the season when people are at their summer homes he handles as much mail as does the post office at Laconia, with its 10,000 inhabitants. Unless there are some questions to be asked, I do not desire to take any more time.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, may we have an agreement in regard to the time?

Mr. MOON. Well, how much time does the gentleman desire?

Mr. TOWNER. I should think we ought to have an hour on each side, I will say to the gentleman.

Mr. MOON. On what?

Mr. TOWNER. I should think we ought to have at least an hour on each side.

Mr. MOON. To discuss this amendment?

Mr. TOWNER. Yes, sir. It means, of course, a consideration of the whole question of rural routes.

Mr. MOON. There are two or three other amendments that will require time for discussion, and I suggest to the gentleman that the other amendments that are to be offered be read now. I will make the point of order on them, and they will be pending, and we will take an hour for discussion of all amendments.

Mr. TOWNER. An hour on each side?

Mr. MOON. No; that is too much. We have had 16 hours of debate on this bill and about 4 hours' debate on this question.

Mr. STEENERSON. We have not heard of any other amendments so far.

Mr. MOON. There are two or three, probably, to be offered over here.

Mr. STEENERSON. It seems to me we had better dispose of this amendment first.

Mr. MOON. I am advised that there are four amendments that will be proposed, and my suggestion was that we let those amendments be now introduced, and I will make the point of order on them all, and then the gentleman can open up the discussion on this full paragraph for such time as may be proper. I think an hour would be plenty of time for both sides.

Mr. TOWNER. I will say I have no objection to that if we can have some time over here. I think there are quite a number of gentlemen——

Mr. MOON. I think, Mr. Chairman, that with 16 hours' debate, and very much of it devoted to this subject, we ought not now take up too much time.

Mr. STEENERSON. Let it run along and see.

Mr. MOON. No; I can not do that. I am not going to open up that question that way.

Mr. TOWNER. Well, how much time would the gentleman be willing to grant?

Mr. MOON. Well, I would be willing to agree to 40 minutes on a side. I do not mean on each side of this aisle, but each side of this question.

Mr. STEENERSON. Who will control the time?

Mr. MOON. Let the Chair control the time.

Mr. TOWNER. No; let Mr. STEENERSON control the time on this side and the chairman on the other side.

Mr. MOON. But the chairman of the committee and Mr. STEENERSON are together on this question.

Mr. TOWNER. Very well; that does not make any difference, I will say to the gentleman, because what is desired is to have an opportunity to discuss this proposition.

Mr. STEENERSON. It seems to me that is very reasonable.

Mr. TOWNER. What was the suggestion?

Mr. STEENERSON. Forty minutes on a side—80 minutes altogether.

Mr. TOWNER. Very well; if that is all we can get.

Mr. MOON. I will make this proposition to the gentleman: That we take an hour and twenty minutes and discuss this question, the gentleman from Minnesota controlling half the time and I will control the other half.

Mr. STEENERSON. That will be perfectly satisfactory to the gentleman from Minnesota, unless the gentleman from Iowa wishes to control the time.

Mr. TOWNER. No.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I will say that there are a number who have not spoken on the bill at all, and I think they ought to be heard at this time.

Mr. STEENERSON. Could not the gentleman make that two hours?

Mr. MOON. The truth about it is, if I did my full duty, I would make the point of order on this paragraph right now; but out of consideration for the gentlemen, understanding as they do that this point of order is to be made, I am willing to let them have two hours and go ahead with the debate, I controlling half and the gentleman from Minnesota controlling half. That applies to the section and all amendments.

Mr. Chairman, I will ask unanimous consent that gentlemen who have amendments offer them now and they be considered as pending, and I will make the point of order on all pending amendments.

Mr. GOOD. With two hours of debate?

Mr. MOON. One hour to a side, half to be controlled by the gentleman from Minnesota and half by myself.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that amendments be now offered to this paragraph to be considered as pending, to be taken up in their order, and at the expiration of two hours' debate, half of which time is to be controlled by the gentleman from Tennessee——

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, before that is decided, let me make a suggestion, that the debate be under the five-minute rule.

Mr. STEENERSON. That is understood, is it not?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not understand it that way.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have 10 minutes.

Mr. STEENERSON. We will say nothing about it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee that unanimous consent be granted that all amendments to this paragraph be now presented and be considered as pending, to be taken up in their order after the expiration of two hours' debate on this paragraph, half of the time to be controlled by him and half of the time to be controlled by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON].

Mr. MOON. And that a point of order be considered as now being made on all amendments.

The CHAIRMAN. And a point of order shall be considered as made to all amendments. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Reserving the right to object——

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, under that agreement, I desire to offer these two amendments and have them read.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LINTHICUM] want to make an objection?

Mr. LINTHICUM. I want to reserve the right to object to the unanimous consent.

The CHAIRMAN. To the request of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] the gentleman from Maryland objects.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I want to find out whether there is to be two hours of general debate, and then if the amendments are to be taken up or whether the amendments are to be taken up in the two hours' debate.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the amendments are to be taken up at the expiration of the two hours' debate, the two hours' debate to be made on the amendments at this time.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. And with no debate on the amendments after the two hours?

The CHAIRMAN. No debate on the amendments after the two hours.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. MOON. These are amendments to the paragraph, I understand.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment to the paragraph just offered by the gentleman from Florida.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. CLARK of Florida: Page 27, in line 6, after the word "stations," insert the words:

"And provided further, That no part of the money herein appropriated for Rural Delivery Service shall be used in payment of any expense upon any motor-vehicle route more than 35 miles in length."

Mr. CLARK of Florida. That is amendment No. 2. The other is No. 1.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the other amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 27, line 6, after the word "stations," insert the words:

"And provided further, That no part of the money herein appropriated for Rural Free Delivery Service shall be used to cover any expense upon any motor-vehicle route until the majority of the patrons to be served by such motor-vehicle route shall by written petition ask the Post Office Department to establish such motor-vehicle route."

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi: Strike out the period and insert, at the end of line 6, page 27, the following:

"Provided, That the Postmaster General is authorized and directed to pay, out of the appropriations already made for the fiscal year 1915, to all letter carriers in the Rural Free Delivery Service during the fiscal year ended June 30, 1915, their executors and administrators, the difference between what they received for their said services and the amount that would have been paid to them in accordance with the proviso contained in joint resolution making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916, approved March 4, 1915."

The CHAIRMAN. That will be known as amendment No. 3. The Clerk will report the next amendment as No. 4.

The Clerk read as follows:

After line 6, page 27, strike out the period and insert:

"Provided further, That no part of the sums hereby appropriated for the rural mail service for the fiscal year 1917 shall be available until so much as may be necessary of the sum appropriated for the rural mail service for the fiscal year 1915, unexpended and still available, shall be paid to all letter carriers in the Rural Free Delivery Service during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915, their executors and administrators, to make the total for the fiscal year equal the amount that would have been paid to him in accordance with the proviso contained in the joint resolution making appropriations for the services of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916, approved March 4, 1915."

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] offers an amendment, which will be amendment No. 5, and which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. GOOD: On page 27, at the end of line 6, change period to colon and add:

"Provided further, That no part of the sum hereby appropriated shall be used to pay the salary of any rural carrier using a horse-drawn vehicle and carrying mail over any route the major portion of which is over a dirt road, the total length of which exceeds 26 miles."

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL] offers an amendment, which will be No. 6, and which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. HULL of Iowa: Page 27, line 6, after the word "stations," insert:

"Provided, That in the payment of sums from this appropriation as salary to rural route carriers the money so paid, when any rural route is reestablished, shall, upon the filing of application by the person who was carrier at the time the rural route was abandoned requesting that he be reappointed, go to said carrier unless there was just cause for his removal from the service at the time the rural route was abandoned or just cause has since arisen."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report amendment No. 7, offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL].

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 27, line 6, after the word "stations," insert:

"Provided, That such sums as may be necessary may be used from the money hereby appropriated to restore the rural routes to the efficiency they had attained prior to March 4, 1915, and it shall be mandatory on the Post Office Department to so restore said routes when a majority of the patrons request in writing such restoration."

The CHAIRMAN. Are there any other amendments? The amendment originally introduced by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] will be called "amendment A."

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I reserve points of order on all the amendments.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands a point of order is reserved as to each amendment. Are there any other amendments? If not, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] is recognized.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, I understood that amendment numbered A would be discussed first.

Mr. MOON. I do not care what one you discuss first, so that the debate is limited to two hours.

Mr. STEENERSON. If that is agreed to, I will yield to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER], the author of amendment A. Does the gentleman from Tennessee desire to use time now, or can I yield to the gentleman from Iowa?

Mr. MOON. The gentleman can go ahead now.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have the attention of the committee, if I may, for a moment. I would like to ask the gentleman from Tennessee a question. As I understand it, the estimate of the department for the rural service for this year was $48,500,000. Is not that true?

Mr. MOON. That is correct.

Mr. TOWNER. And the committee, on consideration, made the appropriation what it is now in the bill, $53,000,000?

Mr. MOON. That is also correct.

Mr. TOWNER. As I understand it, during the years 1915 and 1916 a like sum was appropriated, was it not, for this rural service?

Mr. MOON. Yes.

Mr. TOWNER. And that the department in those years used only about $50,000,000 instead of the amount appropriated. Is that correct?

Mr. MOON. There was quite a large unexpended balance, the exact amount of which I have not ascertained.

Mr. TOWNER. I will ask the chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads this: Does he not think that, considering the attitude of the department toward this service, and considering the fact that the department has refused to use the amounts appropriated in prior years for the purpose intended—does not the gentleman think now we ought to pass some legislation on this bill that will compel the department to use this money for the purposes which Congress intended it to be used for?

Mr. MOON. Does the gentleman want me to answer that question?

Mr. TOWNER. Yes, sir; I certainly do.

Mr. MOON. I will say this, that I have always been and am now in favor of a full and proper and legitimate extension of this service, and I believe that every dollar that is appropriated that can be properly and wisely used for that purpose in the service ought to be used for the extension of the service. But I am aware of the fact that there are 4,320 rural routes in the United States where the carriers are getting $1,200 a year and performing only four hours a day of service, and other routes where they are performing only two hours a day. I think the department ought to handle this money economically, so as to secure for the Government a full maximum eight hours of service if there is a possibility of readjustment; and if, by further readjustments, as to the length and improvement of the service, the Government can save the money, I think it is a wise thing to do it.

Mr. TOWNER. Let me ask the chairman this further question: Was it not the intention of the committee, in raising the estimate of the department from $48,500,000 to $53,000,000, to restore the Rural Route Service to what it was before the reorganization plan, that was instituted in April of this last year, went into effect?

Mr. MOON. Oh, no; no, indeed. The department and the committee had no such purpose. The purpose was to give ample money not only for the maintenance of the routes as they now are but for the extension of this service. I for one, as a member of that committee, would not think for a moment of the wisdom of interfering with the discretion of the department in the changes of these routes where the service could be done as effectually as it has been done heretofore for less money.

Mr. TOWNER. Then it is not the purpose of the committee to take any action that will restore the service as it was before these changes were instituted?

Mr. MOON. I will tell the gentleman that there are but a few of these routes where these changes have been made, and wherever there has been any inconvenience to the people, or where the service is not as good as it has been, that will be remedied, as the department has assured us, so as to give the best possible service to the people everywhere, as was done in a case in Michigan, in the district of Mr. BEAKES. But the gentleman will realize that when there are States that have a large number of routes upon which practically only a fourth service is being done by carriers it is wise on the part of the department to make changes so as to get the full benefit of the pay which they are giving the carrier and give the full corresponding benefit to the people. Take the State of Georgia, for example—and I want to ask, Mr. Chairman, permission here to place in this RECORD a statement showing the number of routes that have been affected by the orders there and in other States, and the reasons for the orders, and in that connection some correspondence from the department covering this question. I ask that I be permitted to do that by unanimous consent.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to insert certain correspondence in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The correspondence referred to is as follows:

I have tabulated here the route, the location, the length of the same, and the number of hours of service rendered by the individual carriers on such individual routes. I show here that there are 4,320 carriers in the Rural Delivery Service who are working to-day less than four hours per day. I show here that they are serving routes from 20 to 31 miles in length. I show that there are 54 such routes in the State of Alabama; that there is 1 in the State of Arizona; that there are 12 in the State of Arkansas; that there are 45 in California; 34 in Colorado; 29 in Connecticut; 24 in Delaware; 41 in Florida; 186 in Georgia; 5 in Idaho; 324 in Illinois; 516 in Indiana; 298 in Iowa; 166 in Kansas; 28 in Kentucky; 7 in Louisiana; 48 in Maine; 31 in Maryland; 33 in Massachusetts; 342 in Michigan; 259 in Minnesota; 27 in Mississippi; 27 in Missouri; 5 in Montana; 44 in Nebraska; 1 in Nevada; 50 in New Hampshire; 46 in New Jersey; 6 in New Mexico; 300 in New York; 73 in North Carolina; 110 in North Dakota; 285 in Ohio; 130 in Oklahoma; 23 in Oregon; 139 in Pennsylvania (this record, however, is subsequent to the recent revision in Pennsylvania; otherwise there would have been 300 or more except for the revision in that State); 10 in Rhode Island; 112 in South Carolina; 38 in South Dakota; 12 in Tennessee; 117 in Texas; 43 in Vermont; 52 in Virginia; 32 in Washington; 5 in West Virginia; 173 in Wisconsin; and 1 in Wyoming.

I may say that in making up this list you will find in every one of these tabulations hundreds of illustrations of where the carrier is performing but two hours service per day, according to actual count kept by himself and not by us.

The CHAIRMAN. And getting how much money?

Mr. BLAKESLEE. $1,200 per year.

OFFICE OF THE POSTMASTER GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., February 19, 1916.

Hon. JOHN A. MOON,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. MOON: I note in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, dated February 14, page 2931, last paragraph of column 1, that Representative GREENE of Massachusetts states that he filed a number of letters with reference to the service at South Westport and Westport which failed to receive any consideration, and I am therefore submitting for your information a copy of this bureau's reply made to Mr. GREENE in answer to the last communication presented by him bearing on this particular service, the circumstances of which are not materially different from many of the complaints against the changes in the service in Bristol County, Mass.

Sincerely, yours,

A. S. BURLESON,
Postmaster General.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
FIRST ASSISTANT POSTMASTER GENERAL,
Washington, February 21, 1916.

Hon. JOHN A. MOON,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR JUDGE MOON: Under date of the 17th instant, in response to an inquiry over the telephone from Representative LAFEAN, I transmitted, for his information, certain data in relation to correspondence between this office and postmasters prior to the issuance of an order regulating the delivery of mail on holidays.

It was hoped that the information conveyed to the Representative might be inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD in order that the department's attitude in relation to holiday service would be made plain. I am transmitting herewith a copy of the letter to Mr. LAFEAN and trust you may find the opportunity to place same in the RECORD.

Very truly, yours,

DANIEL C. ROPER,
First Assistant Postmaster General.

FEBRUARY 17, 1916.

Hon. D. F. LAFEAN,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. LAFEAN: In response to your inquiry over the telephone, I am transmitting herewith for your information the following data in relation to the correspondence between this office and certain postmasters prior to the issuance of the order of November 19 regarding one delivery of mail by carriers on all holidays.

On November 12, 1915, the following letter was sent to the postmasters at several of the largest post offices:

"As many protests have been received by the department against the complete suspension of mail delivery by carrier on holidays, I wish to secure your opinion as to the advisability of establishing the uniform practice of requiring at least one delivery on all holidays. Reference is made to section 284, Postal Laws and Regulations."

In reply to this letter I am quoting paragraphs from the letters of the postmasters to show the practical unanimity of opinion that the interests of the service demands that at least one carrier delivery be made on all holidays:

"Letter carriers and other post-office employees should be allowed to observe holidays whenever the convenience of the patrons will so permit. It is important that prompt delivery be made of a very large percentage of first-class matter. Many letters are mailed in the belief that they will be delivered on holidays, the same as other days, and messages which otherwise would be sent by telegraph are sent by mail. I believe it to be almost a necessity that one delivery of mail be made on each holiday and that on Christmas the carriers should work full time.

"I can see no objection to the observance of local holidays, provided one delivery of mail is made in all cases where such holidays are generally observed by the business houses. In my opinion, however, the number of local or State holidays to be observed at any post office should not exceed three per annum."

"If no delivery were made at all on holidays a post office might as well be closed entirely as on Sunday, for undoubtedly many patrons would call and demand their mail, and the inconvenience resulting would affect not only the patrons but the employees of the office, who would be required to secure their mail and deliver it to them when called for. I believe that one delivery on a holiday should be sufficient to accommodate the public and that after the carriers have left on that delivery the post office should be closed, provision being made for handling the mail for the remainder of the day as it is taken care of on Sunday."

"In reply to your letter of the 12th instant regarding the establishing of a uniform service providing at least one delivery of mail on all holidays, I have strongly held to the opinion that handling of mail is a matter of clear necessity; consequently, as postmaster, I have observed the effecting of one complete delivery of mail by carrier service on each national holiday.

"Again, those patrons who are holders of boxes have a decided advantage over patrons who receive their mail by carrier service. If the Postal Service fails to perform delivery of mail by carriers there is no denial of the service given holders of boxes. The matter should be consistently carried out. The work is current and must be accomplished in regular order."

"It is my belief that at least one delivery of mail should be made throughout the entire city at all free-delivery offices on all holidays, as some portion of the business interests in each city are necessarily compelled on account of the nature of their business to keep their offices open on any holiday that may be observed. I am personally of the opinion that section 284, Postal Laws and Regulations, should be amended by adding 'At all free-delivery offices at least one delivery of mail should be made by letter carriers.'

"This office has always made it a practice to give at least one carrier delivery throughout the entire city on all holidays. Inclosed herewith are several holiday schedules observed in this office. It is the opinion of this office that at least one carrier delivery should be given on each holiday."

"In the business section one delivery is made, beginning at 8 a. m. In other sections the first and second deliveries are made as usual, the first beginning at 7 a. m. and the second at 9.30.

"This applies to all hodidays, with the single exception of Thanksgiving Day, which is almost universally observed, and business is not as heavy as on other holidays. On this holiday one delivery is made throughout the city.

"I consider this service not only essential but necessary for the needs of the service and to relieve congestion on the following morning.

"I am not as conversant with the requirements of other cities as I am in this, but it is my firm opinion that at least one delivery on holidays is a public necessity."

Very truly, yours,

DANIEL C. ROPER,
First Assistant Postmaster General.

OFFICE OF THE POSTMASTER GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., February 19, 1916.

Hon. JOHN A. MOON,
Chairman Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. MOON: Under date of February 16, 1916, a letter was addressed from the office of the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General to Hon. F. W. MONDELL, House of Representatives, stating that:

"In the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of February 12, 1916, page 2779, you are quoted as follows:

"'Why, there have been routes discontinued in my State in the last two or three years that have been running for 10, 20, and 30 years, and no service has been put in operation to fully take the place of the service thus discontinued.'

"In view of the importance of the matter referred to in your statement, it is requested that you advise this office at your earliest convenience as to any routes discontinued in the State of Wyoming that have not been superseded by equally good service and the name of any post office in the State not now receiving adequate mail facilities."

The inference to be drawn from the statement above referred to is grossly misleading, and in order to correct what is undoubtedly a false impression I inclose a list of star routes in the State of Wyoming having a less frequency of service than six times a week, with the annual cost of each route and the cancellations of the post offices supplied thereon, it being assumed that all offices with service of six times a week or more have adequate mail facilities. The department has contracted to pay $103,944.52 per annum for service on these routes, the primary purpose of which is the mail supply of post offices which only produce in postal revenue approximately $15,208 per annum. The productiveness is, therefore, only about 14.63 per cent of the cost, and as the post offices involved are of the fourth class practically the entire amount produced is returned to postmasters as compensation.

This information should be particularly valuable to your committee when viewed in the light of section 3965 of the Revised Statutes, which requires that—

"The Postmaster General shall provide for carrying the mail on all post roads established by law as often as he, having due regard to productiveness and other circumstances, may think proper."

Yours, very truly.

A. S. BURLESON,
Postmaster General.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
FOURTH ASSISTANT POSTMASTER GENERAL,
Washington, December 23, 1915.

Hon. WILLIAM S. GREENE,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. GREENE: I am in receipt of your communication of the 21st instant, inclosing a letter from the postmaster at Westport in protest against the transfer of route No. 1 from his office to South Westport, Mass., as ordered effective the 16th instant. I have noted that the postmaster bases his objections against the change on the supposition that the change in the distributing point of this route will result in the substitution of inferior service, in that the mail collected along the line of travel between Westport and South Westport will have to lay over in the latter post office until the following morning before being dispatched, whereas this was not the case when the route was operated from Westport.

In reply I beg to state that while the facts are substantially as stated by the postmaster, he has failed to mention that mail formerly received at his office at 10.30 a. m. is now delivered on day of receipt, whereas previously such mail was not delivered to the patrons by the carrier until the following day. It has been uniformly held that where it is impracticable to secure both the delivery and dispatch of mail on day of receipt at railroad point that preference should be given to the former as being the more important. This has been found to be the universal opinion of the patrons in all sections throughout the country where it has been left for them to decide whether the schedule should be arranged so as to effect the delivery of mail on day of receipt or the dispatch of mail on day collected.

It also seems that I am justified in inviting attention to the fact that under the recent revision of the service, which made possible the discontinuance of one route in this territory, that practically 50 per cent of the patrons formerly served by route No. 1 from Westport, and who reside in that section of territory taken over by the extension of routes No. 1, from North Dartmouth, and No. 1, North Westport, are afforded not only the advantage of delivery of mail on day of receipt at railroad point, which was not formerly their privilege, but also a similar dispatch of mail collected.

Sincerely, yours,

JAS. I. BLAKSLEE,
Fourth Assistant Postmaster General.

OFFICE OF THE POSTMASTER GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., February 21, 1916.

Hon. JOHN A. MOON,
Chairman Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR JUDGE MOON: I inclose for your information a copy of a communication this day addressed to Hon. CALVIN D. PAIGE in reference to certain remarks of his appearing in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of February 14 concerning changes in the Rural Service in Worcester County, Mass.

Sincerely, yours,

A. S. BURLESON,
Postmaster General.

FEBRUARY 21, 1916.

Hon. CALVIN DE WITT PAIGE,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. PAIGE: Referring to your remarks appearing in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of February 14, 1916, concerning the revision of the Rural Service in Worcester County, Mass., I beg to state that a careful review is being made by a representative of the department of the present arrangement of the service in this county, with the object of perfecting such modifications therein as are shown to be necessary to promote the best interests of the service, and there has been transmitted to the inspector assigned to the investigation all complaints growing out of the changes in the service, with directions that they be given careful consideration to the end that all meritorious cases may be properly adjusted.

As to your reference of the denial of the request of Capt. Horace B. Parker for the extension of route No. 1 from Brookfield, I note that you refer to this as a motor route and that the extension involved 2¾ miles additional travel. Our records show, however, that there were eight families concerned, two of which reside less than two-tenths of a mile from the direct line of the route, leaving but six to be materially benefited. A total travel of 5.6 miles is involved, exclusive of certain omissions, which would effect a net increase of 3.5 miles. It would therefore seem that the department was fully justified in declining to take favorable action on the request.

I may also add that the route in question is now 28.4 miles in length and is not a motor route, nor has the carrier ever made application or been authorized to use any other conveyance in the performance of service than a horse and wagon.

Sincerely, yours,

A. S. BURLESON,
Postmaster General.

Hon. JOHN A. MOON,
Chairman Committee on Post Office and Post Roads,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. MOON: I inclose for your information copy of a letter this day addressed to Hon. THOMAS D. SCHALL, Representative from Minnesota, in regard to his remarks on Rural Delivery Service, as extended in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of February 19, 1916.

Very truly, yours,

A. S. BURLESON,
Postmaster General.

FEBRUARY 21, 1916.

Hon. THOMAS D. SCHALL,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. SCHALL: My attention has been called to your remarks as extended in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of February 19, 1916, page 3295, concerning the revision made by the department in the rural delivery routes in your district, at the post offices of Osseo, Robbinsdale, St. Louis Park, Hopkins, Rogers, Wayzata, Long Lake, Maple Plain, Loretto, and St. Bonifacius. The statements made in criticism of the rearrangement of these routes is so widely at variance with the facts as reported to the department that if permitted to go unchallenged might possibly create an impression in the minds of the uninformed that the department is obstinately endeavoring to change these routes to the detriment of the patrons served.

In the revision of the Rural Delivery Service throughout the country the department has exercised the greatest care in selecting post-office inspectors for this work. The men thus selected are especially qualified by reason of their general knowledge of the subject, their familiarity with the topographic conditions of the territory under readjustment, and the special adaptability for this class of work because of their wide experience in projecting and changing the rural routes. The changes in Hennepin County, Minn., in which the above-named offices are located, were recommended by an inspector who had formerly been engaged in rural-delivery work in this county and who for a number of years had the best means of becoming acquainted with all the conditions affecting the service, and of knowing the requirements on each particular route, so that by reason of this peculiar situation the department is convinced that the reorganization of the rural routes in Hennepin County has been accomplished with as few complaints as would be possible in the circumstances.

The experience of the department in such cases is that some few patrons who suffer a slight inconvenience will loudly protest against the entire readjustment as though endeavoring to create the impression that all the patrons served have been inconvenienced, or that inferior service has been provided throughout the entire county. Investigation has shown, however, that the complainants have been unduly alarmed by rumors and reports, and that they have misapprehended entirely the arrangements made by the department for their mail supply. Some of these complaints have actually preceded the revision itself, as evidenced by letters published with your remarks which bear dates of November 6, November 11, and November 12, 1915, whereas the readjustment of the routes in Hennepin County did not become effective until November 15, 1915. As a further example of the ease with which this situation has been magnified and the department placed in a false light before the public, it is only necessary to state that the records show that with all the changes made in the entire county of Hennepin, very few roads are omitted and not to exceed 59 families have been required to move their mail boxes a short distance, less than one-half mile, while, on the other hand, direct service has been extended to 228 families who have heretofore been deprived of the benefits of Rural Delivery Service. To revert to the old conditions would deprive these 228 families of the direct service they are now receiving.

The transfer of the route from St. Louis Park to Linden Hills Station of the Minneapolis post office has resulted in a decided improvement in the service, as St. Louis Park is still supplied on the route and the carrier stops at this office on his outward trip to receive all mail coming addressed thereto for the former patrons of the St. Louis Park route, while he again passes that office near the completion of his trip, giving all patrons exactly the same service as before the change, the only difference being that the carrier is attached to the Linden Hills Station instead of the post office at St. Louis Park, which is certainly not a detriment to the service. Changes have also been made at the other offices named in your remarks, but these are mostly transfers in base of supply from one post office to another. The department has never attempted, however, to provide each patron of the Rural Delivery Service with mail from a particular office, and you will no doubt concede that the extent of the Rural Delivery System and the millions of patrons served thereby would absolutely preclude the adoption of any plan that would guarantee such service.

Yours, very truly,

A. S. BURLESON,
Postmaster General.

OFFICE OF THE POSTMASTER GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., February 21, 1916.

Hon. JOHN A. MOON,
Chairman Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR JUDGE MOON: I am inclosing for your information a copy of an inquiry this day addressed to Hon. WILLIAM H. CARTER, of Massachusetts, concerning certain remarks made by him on the floor of the House February 17, which are so at variance with the policy of the department that I deem it proper to request that he furnish me with the name of the person or persons connected with the department responsible for such utterances.

Sincerely, yours,

A. S. BURLESON,
Postmaster General.

FEBRUARY 21, 1916.

Hon. WILLIAM H. CARTER,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. CARTER: It is noted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of February 17, page 3133, that in connection with the discussion of the Post Office appropriation bill you state that—

"The department says it is making these changes (referring to the rural routes) to save money, * * * and that when one visits the Post Office Department to seek relief he is told that the people should not complain if their mail was three to five hours late.

"We are told that they should not complain if they should have to change their post-office address, as they are fortunate to get any mail to their homes at all."

The foregoing statements are so at variance with the policy of the department that I would respectfully request that you furnish me with the name of the person or persons connected with the department responsible for such utterances.

Sincerely, yours,

A. S. BURLESON,
Postmaster General.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, in the State of Georgia there are 188 routes where the carriers are performing less than four hours' duty per day. Now, the gentleman will realize that when we are paying for a maximum route of that length, 25 miles, and the carrier is out only four hours in the whole day, that is not a corresponding return to the Government for the salary paid. There ought to be a readjustment in such cases. That is true in a number of cases that the gentleman will find in his own State and in the State which I, in part, represent. These matters have to be readjusted in 43,780 of these routes. The complaint is coming from only a few hundred routes, but they have influence. There is no question about that. It sounds as though there were 10,000 frogs in the pond instead of one; but I want to say to the gentleman in that connection, that if he will look to the letter of the department—their promise in this matter to readjust this service—I think he will be satisfied, as was the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman is using up my time.

Mr. MOON. I will give the gentleman more time if I do—but inasmuch as the gentleman fears that, I will yield now.

Mr. TOWNER. Oh, no, no; I have no objection whatever to the statement that the chairman of the committee is making.

Mr. MOON. I think perhaps I have said all I ought to say in reply to the question of the gentleman. I do not want to take his time.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask one further question of the gentleman. Does he not approve of legislation which would compel the department to restore the old service?

Mr. MOON. No. I think that in every business concern—and this is nothing but a very great business concern—discretion ought to be left to the officers to perform the duty required under the statute in the wisest and best way possible. We can not sit here intelligently and by a general rule tell the Postmaster General that he shall do this and that on a route of shorter or longer distance. You have to leave that general discretion to the executive officer. This matter will all be worked out. Of course while there are about 433 complaints out of forty-three thousand and odd, there will not be very great trouble in working it out. I know the gentlemen who are offering these amendments and who are bringing about this discussion are doing it in good faith, and I know that they want to assure their constituents of their interest; and I want to assure them and their constituents also that this department is making the very best effort to put everything in correct shape. There is to be not only one revision but two revisions of these routes, so that all the people can have the full benefit of the service.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Iowa yield to me at this time?

Mr. TOWNER. If the gentleman will give me five minutes of his time, I will be very glad to.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I want to ask the gentleman from Tennessee a question in the time of the gentleman from Iowa, if I may.

Mr. STEENERSON. I will give the gentleman one minute.

Mr. MOON. I am only occupying the time at the request of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] to answer his question. That is not a matter that I can control.

Mr. TOWNER. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Tennessee include the legislation now proposed by so many Members of the House in the rule that he is asking at the conclusion of the consideration of the bill? The Members of the House are asking certain legislation so that the House can determine what the policy of the Government shall be with regard to these matters.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will be candid with himself, he will realize at once that new legislation proposed in this shape by gentlemen to meet some condition in their district can not be general in its character.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I will yield the gentleman 10 minutes.

Mr. CAMPBELL. But if the gentleman will permit me——

Mr. MOON. One moment. The committee ought to consider this legislation, the department ought to be consulted about this legislation. These things ought to be done in an orderly and proper way. You can not do that here upon an amendment on the floor of this House in a few minutes or under a rule. All I can say to the gentleman is this: That if these questions shall come before the committee for consideration, as in the case of the gentleman from Ohio who has offered a bill, they will be taken up and considered, and when we have reached a proper conclusion with reference to that amendment, and its connection with the whole body of the law, which it is intended to supplement, a bill will be reported if we deem it wise, but we can not undertake to accept the gentleman's suggestion now without consideration.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I think the gentleman from Tennessee and I may be candid with one another with respect to this matter. The gentleman from Tennessee is urging the adoption of a rule containing about 30 pages of legislation upon the ground that it is legislation that will fail if it is not attached as a rider to this appropriation bill. Does not the gentleman know that the legislation urged by so many Members of Congress and of interest to so many people of the country will also fail with respect to rural service if it is not included as a rider on the appropriation bill?

Mr. MOON. Possibly so; but the gentleman must recognize this distinction: The legislation that we are offering is legislation that has been maturely considered, and this is legislation that has not been.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Maturely considered where—not in the House?

Mr. MOON. In the committee, with the advice of the department. So far as the gentleman's statement is concerned, "not in the House," he is correct, because there is nothing very maturely considered here. That is done in the committees, but it so happens that the very legislation to which he refers has in the most part been considered in the House and passed heretofore.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Is it the policy of the Post Office Committee to consider legislation urged by the department rather than legislation urged by the Members of the House of Representatives?

Mr. MOON. No. The policy of the committee is to consider legislation urged by both, and to submit our judgment on both, regardless—I will not say regardless—notwithstanding the views that either may entertain.

Mr. CAMPBELL. But in this case the will of the department is yielded to, and the will of the Members of the House meets no response from the committee.

Mr. MOON. No; that is not it. The will of the department is not yielded to in many matters, but the legislation which the gentleman speaks of is not only recommended by the department and approved by the committee, but the legislation asked for under the rule is legislation that this House has heretofore passed, but which failed of passage in the Senate.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I did not intend to take up any of the time of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER], but he requested me to answer a question, and I have taken as little of his time as possible, and in compensation for the time that has been taken I yield him 10 minutes.

Mr. TOWNER. I thank the gentleman for his generosity. I think it is due to the House that we should have from the chairman a frank statement regarding the conditions. I think it may be safely assumed now that it is not the intention to enact any legislation at this time to cure the evils of which so many millions of people in the United States now complain.

We are not asking very much. We are asking only for a restoration of the service that existed prior to the time when this reorganization scheme of the department was instituted, on about the 1st of April of last year, that is all. My amendment seeks only to reestablish the old standards. It seeks to put on the service only such limitations as will guarantee to the people who have had this service an every-day, all-the-year-round service if possible. Now, under the reorganization scheme of the department they have lengthened the routes on dirt roads from a standard, not established, but really recognized, of 24 miles. They have lengthened these routes to more than 30 miles in many instances. Besides that they have established on dirt roads motor-vehicle routes of 50 to 60 miles in length.

Nowhere in this country, I think—at least, with very few exceptions—has such service been given to the people on these routes as they are entitled to receive. It will not do to say that the department should have this discretion and may be presumed to use it wisely, because we know that the department does not yield to the opinion of the patrons of the routes and the desires of the people who are to be served. We know now that the department holds a different view with regard to this service from that which is held generally by the people. We know now that the department believes that these routes ought to be let out to the lowest bidder instead of a regular salary being paid to the rural carrier. We know now that the department withheld for a year the salaries that we intended should be given the carriers and that we fixed as the pay of rural carriers, and that, although the department had no authority for so doing except their own arbitrary determination, they did so because they thought the carriers ought not to have such salary. Gentlemen talk about this service only requiring the time of the carriers for four hours a day. This statement rests upon no other foundation except that the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General selected certain routes in the United States, and during the month of July, the only month in all the year when roads are universally good throughout the United States, the only month, practically, in which it is possible to use motor-vehicle routes everywhere on dirt roads, and, basing his statement on such a showing, he says that these men are only engaged four hours a day. He did not take the time in January; he did not take the time when the roads were bad; he did not take the time when motor vehicles could not be used at all. So, when the department is endeavoring in every way possible to discredit this service, when it is endeavoring to withhold in every possible way the appropriations which we have made for the benefit of this service and which Congress intends shall be paid for the upbuilding of this service, when the department is diverting or withholding these appropriations to the detriment of the service in every possible way, it seems that the time has come when we are justified in saying that we can not longer trust the department to carry out the wishes and intentions of Congress.

So, Mr. Chairman, we endeavor now to do something, if we possibly can, to restore this service to its old standard, as it ought to be. The point of order may be properly made against this particular amendment, but I judge there are other amendments which will be offered, against which it will be difficult to sustain a point of order. The Members of this House are only endeavoring to do that which we believe is the purpose and intention of Congress to give to this service in order to make it efficient, in order to make it what the people desire and what they have practically determined should be the service that is necessary and proper.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MOON. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CANDLER].

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, as is well known the written law in reference to the Rural Delivery Service in the United States covers only a very little part of our statutes. Practically all the legislation is contained in appropriations which have been made for the service. The first appropriation was only $10,000. Then $10,000 more was added, and afterwards $20,000 more, making $40,000, under which the experimental service was begun. By reason of the fact that it started simply through an appropriation, without Congress providing the course in which it should flow, it has continued along that line up to the present time. Therefore I agree with the distinguished gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] that the time has come when this House should adopt some legislation governing this service, which permeates every part of the United States of America. There is no service in this Government which is more important. There is none which reaches and affects more people than the Rural Delivery Service, because it goes to the homes and firesides, to the wives and children, of all the people throughout the country in the rural districts, and is the greatest service that has ever been given to them in the history of this Republic. A service that reaches so many people and involves so many interests, and reaches so far into the minute affairs of the people of this country, ought to be controlled by the representatives of the people, and ought not to be left to an executive officer to decide the manner in which it shall be administered. [Applause.] We are directly responsible to the people, and I am willing to shoulder my part of the responsibility. We are charged with the duty of enacting laws, and the duty of the executive officers is to enforce the law. When an executive officer does that, then he puts the responsibility where it belongs—upon the representatives of the people, the Members of this House—and he is not justified in exercising that responsibility himself. [Applause.] Therefore I heartily favor some legislation that will regulate and direct and control this service in accordance with the wishes of the people, and in accordance with their purposes and desires, as expressed by the representatives of the people here, who keep in contact with their constituents and know their desires. It should not be decided upon in some place far removed from them by men who do not have the opportunity to come in direct contact with the people and know their sentiments, desires, and purposes. [Applause.] So much for that. I wish I had time to discuss it further.

Now, I have offered two amendments here. The effect of both of them is to require that the amount which has been appropriated by Congress to pay the rural letter carriers their salaries be paid to them by the Post Office Department. Gentlemen, the history of this legislation is this:

In the Post Office appropriation bill for the fiscal year 1915, which was passed by Congress in March, 1914, provision was made for an increase in compensation for rural letter carriers from $1,100 to $1,200 per year, and it was the general understanding that a proportionate increase would be applied to all routes. The phraseology of the bill was identical with that used in all previous bills increasing the compensation of rural carriers.

But with the beginning of the fiscal year 1915 the Postmaster General adopted a new and unexpected basis of compensation, which resulted in withholding from about 90 per cent of the carriers a part of the increase intended by Congress and from a large number the total increase. According to statements made only about 10 per cent of the total number of carriers received the full amount appropriated by Congress.

The Postmaster General's new salary scale was promulgated the last of July, 1914, and promptly upon learning that the will of Congress had been thwarted the House Post Office Committee reported a bill fixing the pay of rural carriers specifically on 2-mile gradations up to 24 miles and withdrew from the Postmaster General any and all discretion in the matter. This provision was a part of what was known as the Moon railway-mail pay bill, which passed the House about August 10 or 12, 1914, and the rural-carrier feature was made retroactive to July 1, 1914.

When the House Post Office Committee reported the Post Office appropriation bill for the fiscal year 1916 the same specific gradation of salaries for rural carriers was provided. In the meantime the Moon railway-mail pay bill was held up in the Senate, and the Senate Post Office Committee reported the Post Office appropriation bill for the fiscal year 1916 before any action was taken on the Moon bill. An amendment was offered to the Post Office appropriation bill for the fiscal year 1916 fixing the pay of carriers upon the basis intended by Congress for the fiscal year 1915, but the amendment went out on a point of order raised by Senator BRYAN. Senator BRYAN'S point of order was based upon the statement that the amount involved had not been estimated for by the Postmaster General and would require an increase in the appropriation, and upon this representation the President of the Senate sustained the point of order, while, as a matter of fact, not a dollar additional appropriation would have been required, as the full amount had been provided for in the appropriation for the fiscal year 1915.

Failure of the Postmaster General to pay rural carriers upon the basis which Congress intended worked a severe hardship upon the rural carrier body. Many of the carriers had purchased new equipment, which they expected to pay for out of the increased compensation, and when no increase was allowed, or perhaps only a small part of the amount intended by Congress, it seriously embarrassed the carriers.

The total amount not paid out by the Postmaster General and still due rural carriers is approximately $3,189,724.37. This amount already has been appropriated by Congress, and it is now only necessary to order and direct the Postmaster General to make the payments in accordance with the will and intent of Congress. Not one dollar of additional appropriation will be required.

Not one dollar additional appropriation, my friends, if the amendment which I have offered is adopted, will be necessary, for the amount is already appropriated and is now available, and all that is necessary is to require by law that the Post Office Department pay it out to these earnest, faithful, and conscientious servants of the public, who are daily serving the people amid storm and snow, sleet and rain, as well as sunshine, and rendering them faithful service every day that goes over their heads. The Good Book says that the laborer is worthy of his hire. These men have performed the service faithfully, they have performed it efficiently, and not only under human writ but under Divine Writ they are entitled to their hire. We have appropriated the money for them and they are entitled to receive it. [Applause.]

Mr. TOWNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. I will, with pleasure.

Mr. TOWNER. I understand the gentleman to contend that his amendment is in order and he will insist upon its consideration by the House?

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. Certainly.

Mr. TOWNER. And if the first amendment the gentleman offered is not in order——

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. Then I contend that the second amendment is unquestionably in order.

Mr. TOWNER. As a limitation upon the appropriation bill?

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. Yes; as a limitation upon the appropriation bill; and the second amendment will bring about the same result if adopted that the direct legislation which is provided for in the first amendment would accomplish. Therefore I appeal to the chairman of this great committee to let us have a vote upon the first amendment and let the Members of this House express by their votes their desires in reference to it. If the first amendment goes out on a point of order, the second amendment, I contend, is in order.

Mr. TOWNER. What is the second amendment?

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. It is a limitation upon the appropriation provided in this bill that the appropriation shall not be expended until this other appropriation is expended in accordance with the law heretofore passed by Congress.

Mr. MOON. The gentleman will hold up $53,000,000 until the carriers are paid more money?

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. Oh, no; if this amendment is adopted the Post Office Department will adjust and pay the amounts which are just and long past due, and which the carriers are entitled to receive, and then proceed with the administration and execution of this law. Nothing will be held up.

Mr. MOON. The gentleman would not seriously insist on such a thing as that?

Mr. KINCHELOE. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question for information?

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. Yes.

Mr. KINCHELOE. As I understand the import of the gentleman's amendment, does it go to the increase of the salaries of those who already draw $1,200 or those who draw a less amount?

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. No; it would not increase any salary. It would simply require salaries already fixed by law to be paid out of the appropriation already made and now available.

Mr. KINCHELOE. With the maximum up to $1,200?

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. Yes. Each one to receive a proportionate amount.

Mr. REAVIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. I will.

Mr. REAVIS. In case the second amendment is adopted, the holding-up process referred to by the chairman of the committee would be done by the department and not by Congress?

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. Absolutely. The department would be responsible for the result; and, in my judgment, they would go ahead immediately and adjust those claims and pay them, and then this appropriation would be available. If the department should hold these settlements back, the responsibility would not rest with the Congress of the United States, but would rest with the executive department of the Government.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. I appeal to all gentlemen here to give this amendment their approval. [Applause.]

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL].

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read the amendment, as follows:

Amend page 27, line 6, by striking out the period at the close of the line, to insert a colon in lieu thereof, and add the following:

"Provided further, That no part of the amount herein appropriated for the Rural Delivery Service for the fiscal year 1917 shall be available unless and until the Postmaster General shall prescribe and fix by regulative order a standard of length for horse-drawn vehicle routes on dirt roads which shall be 24 miles, and that all rural-mail routes now established which exceed such standard by 20 per cent or more shall be reorganized to conform approximately to such standard, and that all rural routes of this class which shall hereafter be established shall conform approximately to such standard and not exceed by 20 per cent or more such standard length of 24 miles; that a standard of length for motor vehicle rural-mail routes shall be established, which shall be 50 miles, and such routes shall be established only on hard-surfaced roads; that all motor routes now established on dirt roads shall be discontinued and reorganized to conform to the standard for horse-drawn vehicle routes on dirt roads, and that hereafter no motor vehicle mail routes shall be established except on hard-surfaced roads. That no rural mail routes of either class shall hereafter be reorganized or established which shall exceed in length by 20 per cent or more the standards herein fixed. No order shall be made and nothing herein contained shall be interpreted to prevent the use by the carrier of motor vehicles on horse-drawn vehicle routes on dirt roads. The order herein provided to be issued by the Postmaster General shall not be revoked or modified during such fiscal year 1917."

[During the reading of the above amendment, the time of the gentleman from Kansas expired, and he was granted time in which to have the reading of the amendment concluded.]

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order on that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Points of order, as the Chair understands, are reserved on all amendments. The gentleman from Kansas has used three minutes.

Mr. STEENERSON. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN].

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of the amendment offered by my colleague, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER], but, as I understand, it will likely go out on a point of order, I shall direct my remarks to the general situation of the Rural Delivery Service as applied to the other amendments which have been offered.

Mr. Chairman, strange things are done in the name of economy, and strange things have been done in the name of economy in reference to rural routes. There is a true economy and there is a false economy. There is a true economy in obtaining efficiency when service can be obtained at a smaller price. There is a false economy in dispensing with service in order that we may expend a lesser sum.

The Post Office Department at present is like people who are buying automobiles and economizing on their household and food supplies. The department is to-day buying automobiles to be used in the screen-wagon service, when we are told that they can not be run at a rate on an average of over 3 miles an hour, and is cutting down the Rural Route Service in order to obtain this money. The American people desire economy, but they desire economy with efficiency. If they get their money's worth when it is paid out, they are usually satisfied, and that is the condition of the people of my district.

Now, the gentleman from Tennessee, the distinguished chairman of the committee, has spoken of the services rendered by these rural carriers somewhat slightingly. Mr. Chairman, I undertake to say that there is no class of Government employees from whom we get so much for the money as we do from the rural carriers. The carrier has to furnish several horses and feed them, and also a wagon; and he is a unique character. He is a hostler, a driver, a sort of clerk and cashier, a mail sorter, a collector, and all sorts of things I can not remember now—there are so many—in which he has to qualify. He must be a wagon mender, a chauffeur, an expert mechanic, and sometimes has to be a road mender and a snow shoveler. For all this he is paid the munificent sum of $1,200 a year.

The gentleman says he only performs at times four hours' service. If he is talking about facts at all, he is talking simply about the time he might be out on the road during a summer day, when the roads are like a pavement, and means that the carrier could run around the route with his car in that length of time. The fact that the carrier must be up early caring for his team, must take an hour for sorting his mail, must attend to his horses again at night, his work upon the road is only part of his work.

Now, Mr. Chairman, these members of the rural carrier service are men of high character. I have never heard of any of them charged with dishonesty. They want to render good service, and there is nothing so discouraging to a man who wants to perform good service as to set before him a task that is utterly impossible for him to perform, and that is what the department has been doing in a large number of these cases. Out in my district there is one route over 31 miles in length, where the carrier says he has four horses and a wagon and an automobile, and still he can not get over the route during the winter weather and in the condition of the roads that then obtains. I suppose the department thinks he ought, in addition, to have a flying machine, because that is the only way by which he could possibly complete his deliveries within the day.

Mr. Chairman, Congress has plainly intimated its intention to the department as to how these routes should be carried on and what money should be expended upon them. In utter defiance of the intention of this House and this Congress, as expressed by the legislation which they have enacted, the Postmaster General has seen fit to take the money from the rural routes and expend it in some other manner. Such being the case, what we ought to do now is to express not merely our intention but our directions in positive terms of injunction, so that it will no longer be disregarded by the department, and the people of our districts will receive the service to which they are entitled. [Applause.]

It is useless simply to appropriate the money. We must direct how it shall be used. It is idle to say that the people have nothing of which to complain. The chorus of complaints which is sounding in our ears would not be made if it were not well founded, and it is strange that the department should be so deaf to it. But if the administration will not hear now, the citizens of the States whose rural service has been demoralized will speak next November in a tone which will compel attention.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL].

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have the attention of the chairman of this committee for a few minutes. I would like to ask him a question that I have asked for the last four or five months, and which has not been answered. I have asked it of the department and I have asked it on the floor of this House. Where did the department find its authority to go into my district, take from the farmers in my district the money that is appropriated to carry on the rural-route service for this fiscal year by the last Congress and devote it to some other purpose?

Mr. MOON. I do not think any such thing has been done.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. There has.

Mr. MOON. I would like to have the proof. I do not believe it.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. The last Congress appropriated $53,000,000 to carry on service that was then established, and some department chief has gone into my district and taken therefrom some 12 or 15 routes, and they are not running to-day and that money is not going into my district. Therefore I ask you where they got that authority?

Mr. MOON. The law does not require that anything shall go into your district, as far as that is concerned. They can take every rural route out of it under the law. If the district is not any better represented, it ought to be done when a proposition of that sort is made here.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I want to ask the gentleman another question.

Mr. MOON. All right.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Did the Postmaster General or anyone in his department ask your committee to grant him this authority?

Mr. MOON. To go into your district?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. To change these rural routes?

Mr. MOON. The general law gives him the authority.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I will ask you that again: Did he come to your committee and ask you for that authority?

Mr. MOON. As to changing from rural routes to motor routes and others, the resolution passed here a year ago gives that authority.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I asked the gentleman from Tennessee a question and he has not answered it.

Mr. MOON. If you will look at the act establishing this service and the general organic act that empowers the executive officer—the Postmaster General—to administer the functions of that office, you will not have any trouble as to finding out where the authority comes from.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I ask you, did he come to your committee and ask for the authority?

Mr. MOON. He would not have to come to our committee. He has the act of Congress authorizing it. He has the general act, that establishes his office, authorizing him to do so.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Did the gentleman come to you and ask for this authority?

Mr. MOON. Why, no. He does not have to come to me nor the committee. It is the Congress; they have given him the authority.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I will ask you another question: What has become of the $3,000,000 that you saved—the $3,000,000 that you did not use on the rural routes?

Mr. MOON. Did not use on any rural routes?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. MOON. It went into the surplus in the General Treasury.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Then you plead guilty of taking the money of the farmers in the Northwest and South and East to finance the Government?

Mr. MOON. I would like to know where the farmers get anything to do with this.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Well, you will probably find out next November. [Applause and laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. MOON. The gentleman from Iowa seems to totally misapprehend the whole question of the power and authority of the Post Office Department.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and yield back the remainder of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. MOON. I do not want to object, but if they will be extended along the line he talked I feel that it would be very much to the discredit of the House to let such remarks go into the RECORD. [Laughter.]

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Why not let the House instead of you judge. And I hope you will read them.

Mr. Chairman, two facts stand out prominently in the present rural-route issue: First, there was general satisfaction among the patrons of these routes prior to last spring; second, there is now general dissatisfaction among the patrons of the routes that have been changed. If anyone takes issue with this last statement, I cite in its support the multitude of protests by the farmers in my own district against the changes that have been made, the innumerable protests that have come from practically every district in the State of Iowa, the almost universal complaint that has come from all over the United States; and lastly, the mighty protest that has been voiced in the Capitol and on the floor of the House, by Senators and Congressmen alike, regardless of party affiliations.

This flow of oratory, this flood of bills, this mighty protest from Congressmen, located all over the United States, simply voices the sentiments of a vast concourse of people scattered through a majority of the States of the Union. The rural communities are indignant at this abridgment of their rights, indignant that a department of this Government, supposed to be established and maintained to develop rural service, should deliberately take upon itself the arbitrary power to curtail the advantages which this Government has accorded them.

That this arbitrary power which the Post Office Department assumed has been without the authority of the Government of the United States is evidenced by the fact that the head of this Department since Congress convened has asked for such authority and been refused. Surely he would not have asked for that which has already been accorded him; surely he would not have sought a privilege already his own right. To substantiate this usurpation of the legislative power by an administrative department, I want to state that on October 12, 1915, I sent to the Hon. James I. Blakslee, Fourth Assistant Postmaster General, the man who has been responsible for this rural-route medley, that has occurred, the following telegram:

DAVENPORT, IOWA, October 12, 1915.

JAMES I. BLAKSLEE,
Fourth Assistant Postmaster General, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: No letter received and no answer to my last telegram. I again urge you to investigate the proposed changes in Rural Route Service before instituting them. If you can not grant my request, will you explain where your department received authority to abandon what Congress established and made appropriation to keep running for this fiscal year. Two mass meetings to-morrow, and people of entire district demand of me an explanation. I again urge courtesy of immediate answer, so that I may explain to them.

HARRY E. HULL.

That telegram has never been answered. Rather, it has never been answered directly. It was answered indirectly when the Postmaster General appeared before the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads and asked to be given authority to make the changes that had already been made. In other words, he asked the Congress of this United States to legalize an illegal act committed by the department of which he was the head. This usurpation of rights, this malfeasance of the prerogative of the Government, has brought about the present deplorable condition, has caused the demoralization that now exists in the rural service.

All this chaotic condition has been brought about in the name of economy. But there has been no economy, rather has there been useless extravagance. Economy means equal or increased efficiency at a less cost. The present status of the rural-route situation in the United States represents approximately a 50 per cent decreased efficiency with less than a 5 per cent decrease in cost. In this theory, that the action of the Post Office Department has been penny wise and pound foolish, I am borne out by that most august body, the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, which saw fit to ignore the recommendation of the Post Office Department, reducing the appropriation about $5,000,000 and to authorize in this bill the same amount as that of last year.

When the Post Office Department reduced the efficiency of the Rural Route System it struck a vital blow at the very arteries of that which has made this country great—the farmer and the rural community. Little by little during the last two decades have the farmers of this country been coming into their own. Nothing has been more instrumental in bringing this about than the rural routes. Rural mail delivery has brought the farmer in touch with city life; it has brought him in touch with the market where the product of his toil must go; it has brought him in touch with the great industrial centers of the world; it has helped him to buy and to sell; it has helped him to reap a just reward for his economy, his thrift, and his unceasing labor. The rural route has made the farm a more desirable place to live; it has encouraged the development of land; it has added a market value to the price of the farm; and it has been one of the most important factors not only in the development of rural life, but in the industrial evolution that has taken place in the entire country. When the department saw fit to decrease the efficiency of this rural-route service under the guise of economy it struck at the very foundation of that which has caused this wonderful development.

In support of what has been done the statement has been made that the farmers ought not to object; that if they did not get quite as good mail service as formerly the Government gave them this service, and they, forsooth, should be satisfied with anything that might be handed to them. In reply I would like to ask, who is the Government of this United States? Is it the Post Office Department here in Washington? Is it Congress? Or do these same farmers and rural communities make up as important, if not the most important, part of this Government? The farmers themselves pay in the funds that keep these routes in operation; they support their own rural-route system, and they have the right to demand that it be as efficient as their own money can make it.

Such being the case, the farmer can justly claim that he has a vested right in the rural routes that have been established; and that having been established, the Government has no authority to change them to his injury. In the community in which I live the value of land is determined on whether or not a rural route runs by the door. Farms on these routes are worth from two to three to five dollars more per acre than the farms which have not these advantages. The farmers now realize that easy access and direct communication with the markets and the industrial centers lends an added value to the property so situated, and its values are so adjusted. In taking away or decreasing the efficiency of a route you are taking away a portion of the asset on which the value of his property is placed, and this the Government has no right to do.

It might be timely here to go a little into the history of the inauguration of rural routes in the United States. This wonderful department of the mail service had its inauguration under the wise and beneficent policy of the Republican Party. It was during the administration of the late President Harrison that the first money, the small sum of $10,000, was appropriated by Congress to establish the first rural route. Then our Democratic brethren came into power and concluded that the Government had no right to waste such a sum on such a foolhardy proposition, and during the Cleveland administration the money was not used. When McKinley was elected, and the Republicans once more assumed their own, the active work of establishing rural routes was really begun. Its immeasurable value was instantly recognized by the farmers, from all over the country came calls for additional routes, its scope grew by leaps and bounds, from thousands the appropriations grew into hundreds of thousands, and then millions, until to-day it is recognized as one of the most important, if not the most vital part, of the mail service of the United States.

This wonderful development has taken place entirely under the wise and judicious management of the Republican Party. Under its régime there was almost universal satisfaction, and it remained for the present administration to inaugurate a policy which has not only retarded the development of the rural routes but has actually placed them in a state of deterioration.

The mail service of the United States was originally planned and developed for the cities. No thought was taken of the rural communities, and the men who produced the wealth were left to depend on community centers for their intercourse with the world. The mail system, as devised and established in cities and towns, was never intended to be placed on a paying basis. The central idea always has been efficient service with a due regard for expenditure, but efficiency first. Since the rural route was established efficiency has been the central idea in its development. It has become recognized as one of the greatest public utilities in this country, and its far-reaching value can never be measured in dollars and cents. No petty policy of false economy should be allowed to interfere with its continued development.

The farmers and the rural communities of this country have a right to demand better mail service than they are now receiving. They have a right to insist that not only shall the backward step that has been taken, in the last few months, be discountenanced, but they have the right, and they will insist, that the rural-route service shall progress until every farmer shall receive his mail at his door equally with every man who resides in the city.

Another factor that the post office has disregarded in its ruthless dissection of the rural routes, is the community interests. When these routes were first established, they were so arranged to cover the area which centered in the town from where they started. In this town the farmer, who received his mail on the route branching out from it, did his business. It was there that he had his bank account, there he bought his groceries, there he sold his grain, and there he got his market prices. When the parcel post was established it gave an added value to his rural route. With the telephone, he could call up his grocer, his butcher, or other business man, place an order, and have it delivered at his home before night. This excellent service gave him all the advantages of living in town.

Under this revision policy that has been put into effect during the last year no attention whatever has been paid to this community interest. The result has been that the farmers have been placed on rural routes emanating from towns where they have no business and no social interests. Under this new arrangement the farmer can not call up his merchant in the city and have his goods delivered, because the route he has been placed upon starts from there no longer. In other words, he has been cut off from all of the business and social life he has been accustomed to, by this revision. This has caused more demoralization than any one thing the Post Office has done since the rural routes have been established.

These are the conditions that exist in the rural service in the United States to-day. The action of the Post Office Department has retarded the development of this great public utility, and in doing so has placed its stamp of disapproval on the development of rural life and rural interests. There is one thing that this administration has not reckoned with, however, and that is the awakened consciousness of power, in the farmer and the small-town resident. No longer will they sit supinely by and let a Government department here in Washington override their interests. There is a universal demand that the rural routes be restored, first, to the status that they occupied prior to these changes which have taken place in the last few months, and, second, that they be developed along the line of efficiency first and economy next. These demands must be complied with or the voice of the people will speak with no uncertain terms at the coming election.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEARNS] two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEARNS] is recognized for two minutes.

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Chairman, I want to offer the following amendment and have it read.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEARNS] offers an amendment, No. 9, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. MOON. I reserve a point of order on it, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. To which a point of order is reserved by the gentleman from Tennessee. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. KEARNS moves to amend, page 27, line 6, by striking out the period at the close of the line, inserting a colon in lieu thereof, and adding the following:

"Provided further, That no part of the amount herein appropriated for the Rural Delivery Service for the fiscal year 1917, shall be available unless and until the Postmaster General shall prescribe and fix by regulative order a standard of length for horse-drawn vesicle routes on dirt roads which shall be 24 miles, and that all rural mail routes now established which exceed such standard by 20 per cent or more shall be reorganized to conform approximately to such standard, and that all rural routes of this class which shall hereafter be established shall conform approximately to such standard and not exceed by 20 per cent or more such standard length of 24 miles, that a standard of length for motor vehicle rural mail routes shall be established, which shall be 50 miles, and such routes shall be established only on hard-surfaced roads which will furnish an every-day service all the year round; that all motor routes now established on dirt roads shall be discontinued and reorganized to conform to the standard for horse-drawn vehicle routes on dirt roads, and that hereafter no motor vehicle mail routes shall be established except on hard-surfaced roads. That no rural mail routes of either class shall hereafter be reorganized or established which shall exceed in length by 20 per cent or more the standards herein fixed. No order shall be made and nothing herein contained shall be interpreted to prevent the use by the carrier of motor vehicles on horse-drawn vehicle routes on dirt roads. The order herein provided to be issued by the Postmaster General shall not be revoked or modified during such fiscal year, 1917."

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, has the gentleman's time expired?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes. The gentleman had two minutes. It has expired.

Mr. STEENERSON. I will yield two minutes more to the gentleman. He wants to explain his amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEARNS] is recognized for two minutes more.

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Chairman, the reason why I have introduced this amendment is because the bill uses the words "hard-surfaced roads" in the establishment of motor-drawn vehicle routes. Now, it is a fact that there are many of our hard-surfaced roads that can not be traveled during some three or four months in the year, and consequently, I know, the patrons who live on such routes do not want a change unless they can receive the same service practically every day in the year.

Now, in my own county, the county where I live, they are establishing two motor routes over roads that can not be traveled more than seven months out of the year, and all of these patrons are objecting to this change. They know that the Post Office Department of the Government has not been properly advised or these routes would not be established.

I took up this matter with the Post Office Department and told that department that the routes it was establishing were not practicable. The department informed me that it had sent a man, an inspector, over these roads and had learned that a motor-drawn vehicle could be driven over these newly established routes throughout the entire year. I want to say to the Post Office Department and to that inspector who made the inspection that there is not a public road or public highway in Clermont County that I have not been over at all times, and I know that on those two particular routes there is as much as 20 miles on each of them that can scarcely be traveled on horseback during these three or four months, not to speak of travel by a motor-drawn vehicle.

Now, in one of those routes that has been established, 24 miles in length, one of the carriers undertook, last summer, to use his automobile, and he found he could not do it. He found it was not practicable even in the summer, let alone in the winter months.

Mr. Chairman, I do not know what influence has been brought to bear upon the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General to induce him to make this revolutionary change in the entire rural-route system. Whatever may have been that influence, or from whatever source it came, I know it did not come from the people who are the patrons of this service.

I know it has been charged upon the floor of this Chamber that this is a political move upon the part of the administration. I do not know whether that charge is founded upon truth or whether it is false. I hope that there may be no foundation for the charge, because it would be a dangerous precedent for such an important department of our Government to undertake to play politics in the discharge of this important branch of the Government.

If it is partisan politics that has caused the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General to adopt this plan of hampering, if not almost completely destroying, the usefulness of the rural carrier system, I would say to him that he can not put in force his program without assaulting the interests of Democrats and Republicans alike. I believe there are now on my desk letters and petitions of protest bearing the signatures of thousands of voters in the sixth congressional district of Ohio, and while I am not acquainted with the politics of all of these petitioners and correspondents, I think I am safe in saying that there are as many of one political faith as another. The indignant protest of the Democratic patron is just as loud and as insistent as that of the Republican patron.

Anyone who is acquainted with the rural routes throughout the country readily recognizes that some of our so-called macadam roads are as wholly unfit for the use of automobiles a greater part of the year as are our dirt roads, and this accounts for the reason why I have offered this amendment, asking that no part of this appropriation be allowed to be used for the maintenance of motorized vehicles unless the entire route would permit of the use of such vehicles practically the entire year. Otherwise the service would be completely destroyed for that part of the year that the automobiles could not be used, and I have personal knowledge that the two routes established in Clermont County can not be traversed by automobiles for some four or five months during any one year. And what is true of the two routes proposed to be established in Clermont County, I am advised, is true of every other county in my district. And what is true of my district, I take it, is true of every other district in the State of Ohio, and I would guess from the speeches I have heard upon this floor and from private conversations I have had with Members that the same conditions prevail throughout the United States. Therefore this proposed change in this department is practically destroying the free delivery of mail to the farmers and the small villages throughout the United States.

Certainly the farmer, the country manufacturer, and merchant are entitled to some consideration and some benefit from the Government that is giving in such a generous and lavish way to the people of the cities. The patrons of the city offices have four and five and sometimes a dozen deliveries of mail per day. Surely the people of the rural districts are entitled to some consideration, and without exception there is not a rural neighborhood in the entire country that is affected by this proposed change but is protesting with all the energy it can command.

There is another phase of this question that is entitled to great consideration. If these motor routes are established, as is proposed by the department, patrons who for years have been receiving their mail from a certain office and have established business enterprises and are receiving their mail over a rural route, are now compelled to receive their mail, against their protest, from another office entirely removed from their own locality. This will cause long and continued delays in delivery. It will mean they will have to pursue an educational program with all their correspondents. This will mean they will have to notify all of their old-time correspondents and business associates of the change in post office, which will mean, for a long while, a confusion in their mail.

There is another phase of this question that will work a hardship upon both the patron and the carrier. Men who have devoted years of their time in carrying mails and have consequently become proficient in this line of work will be thrown out of employment and their positions surrendered to men new in the business and in many instances incompetent.

If a point of order is sustained by the Chair to the amendment which I have proposed, I will then be glad to vote for the first amendment offered by the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK]. It seems to me there can be no point of order raised against his amendment, and it seems to me further that it is eminently fair, as it takes the power of destroying a rural route at the pleasure of the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General out of that gentleman's hands and places it in the hands of the patrons of that route. Whenever they want a change, or a majority of them want a change, under that amendment they can secure it and not before, and surely there could be no objection urged to the adoption of that amendment. It places the power of creating and destroying it in the hands of those who are most vitally interested, and whenever a majority of them decide they want to motorize their route they have it in their power to do so. That is the basic principle upon which our Government was founded, and surely at this late day there ought not to be anyone bold enough to question the fairness of such an amendment. I had not thought to talk upon this subject until just a few moments ago, but as this matter is of such vital importance to my own district I take advantage of the opportunity to address the membership of this House that was offered to me by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON], who has the disposal of the time on this side of the aisle, and I therefore, Mr. Chairman, want to thank him for this privilege.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] four minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] is recognized for four minutes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I notice in the report of the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General that no refernce is made to any income derived from the rural mail service. Apparently no reference to receipts from this service is made in the report of the Postmaster General himself, and so far as I observe from the records we have had no data on that subject since 1911.

In 1911 the Free Rural Delivery Service cost the Government $37,126,812. We collected in postage on matter collected on rural routes $7,570,000 in that year, a net loss to the Government of $29,500,000 for this service in 1911. We propose now to appropriate $53,000,000 for this service for the coming year.

Now, I want to submit a word or two about the history of the Free Rural Delivery Service, concerning which most of our friends from the country districts are intensely interested. I make no reference to politics in this statement, because the Free Rural Delivery Service was first suggested by a Republican Postmaster General, and I am in favor of the service.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. GOOD. The gentleman is complaining about losses to the rural service. Will the gentleman explain what proportion of the $60,000,000 loss that the Government sustains for carrying second-class mail matter was caused by some notable publications from Philadelphia?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I think it is argued that that is all for the benefit of the consumer of mail matter in the country districts, and that the return comes back to the post office through correspondence created by the preference given to these publications. I think that is the argument. I observe that the gentleman smiles approvingly.

Now, why the Postmaster General and the Fourth Assistant have not given us any figures with regard to receipts since 1911, I do not know. I would be very glad, indeed, if some member of the committee would explain. I am in favor of the Rural Free Delivery Service. It was established by a Republican administration, and I do not wish to see it unduly curtailed; but I wish to call attention to a section of the report of the Postmaster General which indicates that the fact is constantly before the head of the department that the public receives the maximum return for the money expended, and that there is an ever-increasing cost per patron served. In this House we hear so often of favoritism to those who live in the great cities and of the burdens we lay upon our brethren in the country that I want to call attention to the facts as to the Free Rural Delivery.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman give me two minutes more?

Mr. STEENERSON. I have not the time.

Mr. MOON. I yield two minutes to the gentleman.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I thank the gentleman. Of course I am not in any way reflecting upon the service, because I believe in it. I have always stood for better means of communication between the city and the country; but inasmuch as the burden of taxation, consequent upon recent legislation at least, falls heaviest upon the man in the city who is usually most abused, I think it is fair to observe that we are now giving to our brethren in the country a service costing the city man as well as the country man at least $53,000,000, upon which there is probably a net loss of $45,000,000. If I have overstated the loss, or the amount of this contribution by the city man as well as the country man to the country exclusively, of course I stand to be corrected. In view of the fact that we are considering a great public service, the Rural Free Delivery, it does seem fair that the man who receives the direct benefit of it, the man remote from centers of population, should understand that the burden which is levied upon all the people is very largely in his interest, and that it falls heaviest upon those centers of population which contribute most to the taxes of the country. I wish this borne in mind sometime when those questions are discussed in the House which involve new forms of taxation to be placed upon the centers of population. We vote freely for the improvement of new routes and postal roads. Only recently many of us from the cities voted for $25,000,000 to extend the country roads. The burden of that taxation will be levied most heavily upon those who had already paid for their roads in the cities. I mention this, because it is to be hoped that we shall understand each other better as between the country and the city, the factory and the farm. [Applause.]

Mr. STEENERSON. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DOWELL].

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, when the present Fourth Assistant Postmaster General took charge of the Rural Service, I believe nearly every community within the United States was entirely satisfied with that service. I think there was but little complaint from any source with reference to the efficiency of the service, and it occurs to me that it is one of the amazing things that when he took possession of this office this official proceeded immediately to the rearrangement and readjustment of the Rural Service, and by so doing dissatisfied nearly everyone in the rural communities of the country. I am unable to understand just why this readjustment was made. It has been charged upon the floor of this House that one of the reasons for the readjustment was to discharge a large number of faithful, efficient, and trustworthy public servants, the rural mail carriers, who are under civil service, and who are in a classified list, and who otherwise could not be dismissed except for cause, in order that their places may be filled by political appointments. I do not pretend to know the truth of this charge, but I sincerely hope it is not true, because I do not want to believe that a great department of this Government would demoralize a great service like the Rural Service of this country in order to discharge political obligations. But I do charge the fact to be that, so far as this service is concerned, since this rearrangement and readjustment, the service has been crippled and the people are not receiving the efficient service that they received before.

Some days ago the distinguished chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads [Mr. MOON] stated on the floor of the House that there would be a rearrangement of these rural routes where they were not satisfactory. I want to say in reply that any business management of this Government would have required this investigation before this change was made, and if he had properly investigated, these changes would not have occurred. I want to say that no business man would have demoralized this service without first making an investigation as to what he could and could not do. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The statement of the distinguished chairman, Mr. MOON, that there would now be an inspection in some of these places where objections have been made comes rather late, it seems to me. I am hopeful, however, that this investigation he refers to will be made and so far as possible the mistakes made by the department may be corrected. But I have seen no satisfactory evidence that the department intends to correct these mistakes and give to the patrons of these rural routes the service they are entitled to receive, and Congress should take action in this matter, for I see no relief elsewhere.

Much has been said about the rural carriers, and I want to add that when you take into consideration the fact that these men must furnish their own equipment at their own expense, and when you find that after they have paid all of these expenses, including the upkeep and depreciation, that they receive much less pay than the Government is paying for other like service, the intimation coming from the department that these men are not earning what they receive should not carry any weight here.

From the remarks of the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General before the committee reporting this bill, I take it he believes that this service should be placed under the contract system. I have not the time to discuss this question now, but I believe everyone is and ought to be willing to pay a reasonable and fair compensation for this service, one that will maintain the rural carrier and his family in a reasonable and respectable manner.

This Government should demand an efficient service and should be willing to pay a fair and reasonable wage for that service.

The bill under consideration makes sufficient appropriation for carrying on the Rural Free-Delivery Service in the efficient way it was carried on prior to the so-called readjustment, and an amendment to this bill should be adopted now requiring the Postal Department to expend this money in the manner Congress has intended it should be expended, by giving to the farmers of the country a good and efficient rural service. Nothing short of this will be satisfactory.

Mr. STEENERSON. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MATTHEWS].

Mr. MATTHEWS. Mr. Chairman, I understood the chairman of the Postal Committee to say a few moments ago that only a very small per cent of the large number of rural free-delivery routes in the United States were affected by the recent action of the Post Office Department. As my district happens to be one which is very seriously affected, I want to take just a few moments in explaining conditions as they exist there.

I have listened with a great deal of interest to what has been said on the floor of this House in connection with the Rural Free Delivery Service, a service in which the people of my district are deeply interested and which until the past few months was fairly satisfactory. Having started some 13 or 14 years ago, it has been built up and gradually extended, until now practically all rural communities are having, or rather were having, their mails delivered promptly each day of the week except Sunday in a manner that caused little, if any, complaint.

Now comes the Postmaster General and, by his proposed plan of motorizing the service, simply disarranges all existing conditions and demoralizes the service to such an extent that I have been deluged with letters and petitions protesting in vigorous terms against the changes proposed. In several instances, in two counties of my district, protests have come in signed by every patron of the office, giving good reasons why they did not want the proposed changes made, all of which have been filed with the Post Office Department. The stereotyped reply comes back that it is in the interest of economy. Economy that cripples a service and makes it, in many instances, worse than no service is surely a false economy.

Mr. RICKETTS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MATTHEWS. Yes.

Mr. RICKETTS. Was not the old service universally satisfactory?

Mr. MATTHEWS. It was entirely satisfactory. I am just coming to that. On the rural routes in my district at present the mail is delivered at the nearest point on the route that passes any farmhouse. If the proposed changes are made, a large number of people will have to go from a quarter to three-quarters of a mile to some crossroad corner to get their mail, and in many instances patrons claim their mail will be from 12 to 24 hours late.

The proposed motor route will pass the corner one-quarter of a mile from my house. It might as well be 4 miles, for that matter. What do they expect me to do when any large packages come as registered mail? Do they expect me to be on the corner two or three hours waiting for the mailman? Have been working for years to work up a mail-order trade on honey in the cities, and that will be all gone with a change in the route.

And there are many other farmers in the same condition.

Another man writes:

I understand the Government proposes to establish one auto route for the two routes now out of Pandora. I am one of the trustees of Riley Township, and I know we have 6 or 7 miles of dirt road or unimproved roads, and I believe our mail would be a day late on account of the train coming into Pandora so late in the forenoon, and others would be compelled to go a half mile to get their mail.

Another man writes from Payne, Ohio:

All of our papers will be several days late. We would positively discontinue our daily papers.

The above are but samples of scores of similar letters received during the past few weeks. I never knew of so much universal dissatisfaction, or of such large numbers of people so thoroughly aroused and so highly incensed as they are over the proposed disruption of their mail service.

We have a large number of good, improved roads in my district. Many are still unimproved and in the late fall, winter, and early spring are utterly unfit for automobile service. In the winter we frequently have deep snow, which often drifts in places several feet deep. So that for at least three or four months of each year a motor service is impracticable, if not impossible. To change to horse service for this period would cause confusion and delay, and I doubt if any carrier can be found who is willing to do so. Very few, if any, of them are able to keep an automobile and a horse and wagon in addition.

Another complaint comes from the residents and business men of several small towns, which at present have two or more rural routes running out of the towns. Under the proposed plan these routes are to be discontinued and hundreds of patrons forced to receive their mail from some other, larger town. The people in these small towns are justly indignant, claiming that their towns will be injured and lose its identity. They fear, and with good reason, that the postal receipts at their office will fall so low that in a short time it will be discontinued. The people living in these small towns have as much pride and interest in their town as do the people living in larger towns.

Another feature is that many of the carriers have been in the service for years, starting in at $60 per month, and have given good, faithful, and efficient service, none of whom are to be transferred or allowed to take over an automobile route unless they take a civil-service examination in competition with all comers. For instance, one carrier writes me as follows:

When I made my examination 13 years ago last October, in 1902, the department says that the position would hold for life, or as long as that part of the service would be in force, unless the carrier would disobey the civil-service rules or for criminal offenses. Under the new way the old carrier would stand no show to retain his position as he would be treated the same as a new man taking the examination, only he would be entitled to one-half of 1 per cent for each year of service up to six years, which would be 3 per cent at the most. On March 2, 1916, it will be 13 years that I served as rural carrier from this office; during this time I have never been accused of any wrong, nor did any wrong. Have performed my duties as carrier faithfully; in fact, have risked my life at different times to serve my route and my patrons, the very best that any man could expect to do. I was 35 when I started on my job; have devoted the best part of my life in serving the United States faithfully. Now, when the pay is fair, which it surely was not when I started, they come along and start something which surely will not be a success, and an injustice to the farmers, and to throw the old carriers in the scrap pile.

They were told when they entered the service that it would be a life job so long as they were efficient. Now it appears that merit and long, faithful service are of no avail. They are brought into competition, in many instances, with young men just out of school and who will undoubtedly pass a better examination at any of these so-called civil-service examinations than the average carrier who has grown old in the service, and who if thrown out will be unfitted for any other business.

The long experience and efficient service of the present carriers unquestionably fits them to render service that will be far more acceptable to the public than can be expected from a score of new, inexperienced carriers, no matter if their grades are somewhat better than the present force. To say the least, it looks like an injustice was being done to hundreds of public servants, many of whom have taken a civil-service examination years ago, been faithful to their trust, and now must walk the plank to make room for others. No such thing could happen anywhere except in the public service. [Applause.]

Mr. MADDEN. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD].

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, during the past three years three distinctive visitations have come to the farmers of the Middle West, each of which increased in its destructiveness to the interest of the farmer. First, in 1913, our farmers lost about $40,000,000 by hog cholera. Then, in 1914, the foot-and-mouth disease spread over the Central West, resulting in tremendous loss to our farmers; but in 1915 there came a visitation, directed from the Post Office Department, which was more destructive to the real interests of the Central West than any that had preceded it. [Applause.] That was a disruption of the Rural Delivery Service of the Central West. I do not believe that the Members of this House who represent rural communities or who represent city communities, where no such change has been made in the rural routes, can have any idea of the effect of the order of the Postmaster General, by which rural routes were discontinued by the wholesale and new routes were established where there were no roads, over creeks where there were no bridges, over roads that are impassable, changes which require men to change their post-office addresses without their consent, and compel them to select a post office as their post-office address from 8 to 10 miles farther from their home than the one which had been their post-office address for many years. There is absolutely no rhyme or reason for these changes made by the Post Office Department, or, rather, by clerks in the Office of the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General. As has been stated here on the floor of the House, if the department had sent inspectors over the routes where it was thought it was necessary to make changes, and caused an investigation to be made, and, after complete investigation by a man who had gone over the route, a change was made, no complaint would have been heard, but that was not the policy pursued. Clerks down here in the Post Office Department, drawing salaries of about $1,200 a year, were set to work on these various routes, made 10 or 15 years ago, made only after a personal inspection of a post-office inspector. I recall one case where a postal route was established shortly after the rural service was established over an old military road. That route was changed, the military road was abandoned, and the route was established over narrow east and west roads, which are but little used, where the snow drifts so that the carrier can not pass over these narrow roads after a snowstorm. If Members will take the time to consider the inconvenience of the farmers and stock raisers who are to-day receiving their mail and daily papers and their reports of the live-stock market some 24 hours later than they did before the changes were made, I think they will understand the real grievance of the men who live on the farm, who have had this service, and who believe they are entitled to the continuance of it.

The amendment I have offered is a limitation on this appropriation and absolutely places the rural service where the Postmaster General can not use a dollar of this money to pay the salaries of the rural carriers over dirt roads if that route is more than 26 miles long. That is 2 miles more than the standard route, and it was drawn intentionally with that in view, in order to give the Postmaster General some leeway in establishing these routes. Twenty-four miles is about all that a carrier can carry the mail over a dirt road, and experience has caused the Post Office Department to make a 24-mile route over a dirt road a standard route, and my amendment provides that he can extend that to 26 miles where necessary, but that he can not do what he has been doing recently and make rural routes over dirt roads as long as 32 miles and thus demoralize the service. [Applause.]

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, it is very delicious to hear my friend again. I have heard that speech three times since this bill has been under consideration, and I hope when he revamps it and sends it out to the people he will put it in a shape that will be entirely acceptable.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, if that is true, then somebody else has been making my speech, because this is the first I have made on the subject. [Laughter.]

Mr. MOON. I am quite ready to agree to that, for I think one man wrote all of these speeches and these gentlemen are all repeating them as best they can. [Laughter.] There is absolutely nothing in this contention. There are a few disorganized routes, due to the fact of changes that turned out to be improper and that are now being readjusted.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOON. Yes.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Chairman, I wish to interrupt at this point just to say that if the Post Office Department had disorganized the rural routes in the district in Tennessee which the gentleman from Tennessee represents, he would never make that statement.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I want to say that when I say that the Post Office Department disorganized a few routes, I, of course, do not mean, as the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LLOYD] must know, that there was any intention to disorganize them, but that in readjusting routes it is a fact that he ought to know that it inevitably happens that some person must be inconvenienced and the route to that extent, so far as the interest of that person is concerned, disorganized.

With respect to Tennessee, my position is this: I said to the Post Office Department that, as far as my district was concerned, they could go into it and change every route in it if they wanted to, if they would make a better public service, or if they failed in doing that then that I shall be satisfied with a proper readjustment that may be made in the public interest. My good friend Mr. GOOD, and others here, speak of this as though it were a political matter. There is nothing political in it, not a particle. The gentleman says these routes were changed by a clerk in the Post Office Department.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOON. Yes.

Mr. GOOD. I said that the routes established were made not by clerks in the Post Office Department and were not made by inspectors as they were originally established.

Mr. MOON. The routes were originally established by inspectors, every one of them.

Mr. GOOD. Certainly.

Mr. MOON. They were reviewed and revised by inspectors.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOON. I can not yield.

Mr. LLOYD. But the gentleman wants to state the truth.

Mr. MOON. I never state anything but the truth.

Mr. LLOYD. The truth is that in the district I represent the changes were made here, and not made through inspection at all.

Mr. MILLER of Pennsylvania. And that is so in my district—never an inspector came there.

Mr. MOON. I want to say that the gentleman from Missouri is a little bit too fast. I was not talking about what has been done recently at all in the changes made. I was speaking of those routes in their inception, and I say it is true, and no truthful man can deny it.

Mr. LLOYD. I do not deny that at all.

Mr. MOON. The gentleman ought not to have spoken so quickly, because he had not reached the point where he could properly speak on this question. What I said was this, and I repeat it, and there is no honest, truthful man who will gainsay it: I said that these services were established at first by inspectors; that they were reinspected and established and arranged to suit the department, and so the gentleman from Missouri jumps in and undertakes to say I had made a statement that was not correct. I say it is correct, as far as I have stated; but I propose to state, and do state now, that these routes recently changed were in part changed upon the action and advice of inspectors and were in part changed in the office from maps and files that contain the facts, and were readjusted in that way. In some instances the inspectors were not on the ground at all and in some they were. [Applause.] There is no question about that.

Now, why could not they in the office make a change that would save the Government money from maps? The result shows that thousands of those changes made have been satisfactory, and only a few hundred have not been satisfactory. Now, gentlemen undertake to say that there are some politics connected with this.

Mr. REAVIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOON. Of course; I will yield to anybody. That is the reason I let the debate run on in this way, when it ought to have been closed up long ago.

Mr. REAVIS. Do I understand the gentleman to justfy the conduct of inspectors and clerks in taking the chance of revising routes from maps and blue prints in the city of Washington without going over the routes and making a personal investigation?

Mr. MOON. I think that where the facts are all known that might be done, and that where the facts are not known, or where there is an uncertainty, it ought not to be done.

Mr. REAVIS. What does the gentleman mean by saying where the facts are known?

Mr. MOON. I just stated that many of these routes have been revised several times, and there are maps of all routes and all connecting lines and all facts necessary and essential to establish the new routes. Now, in many instances that is done, and there are no complaints. In many instances I am sure there are just complaints. I am not undertaking to say everything has been done wisely and justly; I think some have been done improperly, but I do not think we should be foolish about it. It is a matter of business that has to be settled, and the department is trying to settle it, and doing the best it can, so what is the use of continually discussing the matter and abusing the executive officers? Gentlemen charge it was done for political purposes.

Mr. GOOD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOON. Yes.

Mr. GOOD. Does the gentleman refer to anything I might have said as indicating political purposes?

Mr. MOON. I do not know whether the gentleman said it or not, but if what I said does not fit——

Mr. GOOD. It does not fit me because what I have said has no politics in it.

Mr. MOON. I do not know that he said it was for political purposes.

Mr. REAVIS. Does not the gentleman believe a disorganization of a route by the office of the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General is more the result of incompetence than of politics? [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. MOON. No; I do not think it is incompetence. I want to say, so far as politics is concerned, the gentleman who has been doing this work is a well-recognized Republican who has been in this department for years——

Mr. REAVIS. If he is a Republican, he has departed largely from the faith since he has been under a Democratic administration.

Mr. MOON. Every class of sinners sometimes repent and come home, and I reckon he had the right to do it. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. HULL of Iowa. The gentleman complains about gentlemen saying there are politics in this.

Mr. MOON. Oh, no; the gentleman is mistaken. I do not care what gentlemen say about it.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. The gentleman referred to it.

Mr. MOON. I referred to it, but it is utterly immaterial, and why should gentlemen disturb themselves about it?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. The gentleman will admit this is politics, that they took $3,000,000 and put it into the general deficiency that the Democratic Party had created. That part is Democratic politics, is it not?

Mr. MOON. I do not see any politics in connection with that. I think the gentleman is just a little bit off and does not know what he is talking about.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. This administration has a deficiency, has it not, in the General Treasury?

Mr. MOON. Deficiency of what?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. In the General Treasury.

Mr. MOON. No; there is no deficiency in the General Treasury that I know of. Now, Mr. Chairman, I will yield to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER] five minutes. I will ask the Chairman how much time I have left.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has 30 minutes.

[Mr. RUCKER addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD] five minutes.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, the first outrage committed by this administration on the Rural Free Delivery System in Indiana was committed in Tippecanoe County, and it was done on the 1st day of September, 1915. An order was issued whereby all of the old carriers, without any cause, were discharged. For 24 days a new set of carriers, who had taken no examination, were placed upon the roll to handle the Rural Free Delivery System over these new routes. What is the result? They tell us there are but few complaints coming from over the country. We have had that reiterated here two or three times by the distinguished chairman of this committee. I believe that there has not been a single change in all the United States, if they were made upon the same basis that the changes were made in Indiana, but that the same complaint has arisen that is now arising there. Yet when we go to the department and say to those in charge that these routes are not working and the people are not being provided with their mail delivery as they should be provided they say, "Give it a chance." From the 1st day of September, in Tippecanoe County, down to this actual hour, in fair weather and in foul, this new system has been in vogue, and petition after petition has come from the people along these changed routes to the department complaining of their failure, and they still say, "Give them a chance." Some of them are 50 miles and some are 60 miles long. Some of the patrons, who were getting their mail at 9 or 10 o'clock in the morning under the old system, can not now get it until the next morning. Formerly they had their mail delivered at the door. Now many of them have to walk across an entire section in order to get it. And still they say, notwithstanding this evidence accumulating all the time, "Let it have a fair trial." They have inaugurated other systems of this character that will go into effect upon the 1st day of April, and if they are carried out as they have been laid out it will be absolutely impossible for six months out of the year for people living along these routes to get their mail with any degree of certainty as to time.

How do they establish these routes? Sometimes they do send out an inspector, as has been stated here, but they do not send an inspector out over these routes when the roads are muddy and the snows are deep. They send them out in fair weather, and they then test out what is the utmost that the carrier can do, and they arrange the route accordingly. In some cases, I say, they have made the routes 60 miles long.

Now, then, they can not do this work even when the weather is good. A number of the carriers placed on these routes in Tippecanoe County have resigned. Two of them resigned in the last 10 days, because it is absolutely impossible for them to do good work, and a number of others are now threatening to resign. So you see a fair trial has been given. The department knows that the system is not working, and as evidence of that fact they have called in their inspectors, who are scattered out all over this country in making their changes, and have said to them, "The fire in Congress is getting too hot, and we will defer any further work along this line until Congress adjourns."

Gentlemen, the old routes as established were doing excellent service. No complaint as to them was made. These rural routes were established for the benefit of the farmer, and even if the system costs more than it brings in, it is compensated in many other ways. It was one of the primary functions of rural routes to encourage the farm boy and the farm girl to remain on the farm, in order that life there might be made more pleasant, and in order that they might have access to many more of the comforts and accommodations enjoyed by those who are living in the cities throughout the country. We are hearing the cry all over this country, "Back to the farm," yet we are by this act discouraging the very thing that we are preaching for. The farmer of this country, after the rural free-delivery system was established, could be informed every morning with reference to the markets. He knew as well as the city gentleman did what the prevailing markets were. Now he can not obtain that information until the next day if he depends upon the Rural Free Delivery Service for his mail. Many of the farmers living within 2 miles of the cities on these rural delivery routes have quit the rural routes and send into the town for their mail, in order that they may have their mail every day. Some have asked to be changed from one route to another, and yet those petitions have been refused. They say, "Give us a fair chance." A fair chance has been given, and the new service has been found wanting in every particular. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SLOAN].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SLOAN] is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, the constant drift from the country to the city is a matter deplored by all Americans. It is a drift that can not be stayed or diminished by positive mandate of law. It is one that should be stayed by making the country more profitable and delightful to live in than the city. Civic society and the interest and activity of individuals may control and modify many of the conditions which will stay this drift. Advanced schools, sanitation, and modern conveniences of the home, the telephone, and the automobile, all will aid. But one great factor in making country life desirable and of which the Government has absolute monopoly is the United States mail. Its extension to the rural communities more than anything else that the Government has established makes country life profitable, comfortable, and convenient.

In this proposition we have before us to-day I understand the purpose of this committee in appropriating $4,500,000 more than was asked by the department is to promote the efficiency of the service more than in the sordid question of possible economy. I think the committee wisely added this appropriation to emphasize to the offending department the desire of Congress that we should have efficiency and not sordid economy or pinch-penny gain.

I believe, Mr. Chairman, that the standard set in this House by the chairman, like the standard fixed by the Post Office Department, is altogether too high. When our genial and distinguished chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads says that the service has not been injured in his district it is drawing altogether too strong a bow. Because it would have been, of course, lese majeste or contempt of court for the department to have gone to the stronghold of Tennessee represented by our chairman, Mr. MOON, and there assailed the rural routes as they have been assailed elsewhere throughout the United States. Such temerity would not have been tolerated.

Mr. MOON. The gentleman is mistaken about complaints being made throughout the whole United States. There are only about 430 routes where complaints have been made in the United States.

Mr. SLOAN. Well, as I say, the gentleman's district as a standard is altogether too high, also the department's standard was too high when the July schedule was selected to measure the gauge of routes throughout the United States. In January, when the mud is deep or the drifts of snow are high, a reasonable idea might have been obtained as to the practicability of these routes recently established. Instead of that the department took July, when the roads were good and the facilities for movement were the best. In July farmers receive and send less mail than in any other month. They take and read less papers and magazines. Roads are better. It was as highly improper to have selected July as a standard month as to have selected John D. Rockefeller as the standard of the ordinary property holder in the United States, or Jesse L. Willard as the standard of strength, or the chairman of the committee [Mr. MOON], or the Speaker of the House [Mr. CLARK], or the majority leader [Mr. KITCHIN], or the minority leader [Mr. MANN] as standards for the rest of us here to approximate. I believe, Mr. Chairman, that the standard of schedules should not only have included January, but should have included July and May and October and November, so that a fair average of all these months under the varying conditions would have been reached. This would have been a fair basis for the schedules of the rural routes. These the chairman of the committee could have defended. Now, no one can defend them, or at least no one on this floor has undertaken their defense.

I am not complaining as to my district at present, because thus far we have not been assailed. But from what has been going on I know that my district is not immune, and I trust that from this increased appropriation, with its excellent purpose and the speeches that are delivered in this debate, the gentleman who presides over the fourth division of the Post Office Department will "take a tumble to himself" and understand that he is expected not to make money out of the Post Office Department, but that he is to serve the American people in this important function of government and obey the will of Congress, which reflects the sentiment of the American people. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Nebraska has expired.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MILLER] two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MILLER] is recognized for two minutes.

Mr. MILLER of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, the distinguished chairman of this committee made the remark when he was on his feet that these changes were made by inspectors. Now, the only department of the Government that I have visited, or ever visited——

Mr. MOON. The gentleman misunderstood me. I said the first routes were established by inspectors and revised by inspectors, and many of these changes were made by inspectors, but some were not.

Mr. MILLER of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, the only Government department in this city that I have visited during the last three months is the Post Office Department; and I will say for the officials that they have treated me with the utmost courtesy, but have not granted anything that I wanted. [Laughter.] The Fourth Assistant Postmaster General is a most genial gentleman. He is the friend of three gentlemen in my county who are most distinguished Democrats and who are very excellent friends of mine. Since last March with some of them I have been trying to get the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General to send inspectors into my district, and particularly into my own home county, and I believe that the postmaster of my home town tried to show to the department the fallacy of what they were doing. I wrote the department, but I never obtained an answer to my letter, and there never was an inspector, to my knowledge, sent into my county or into my district to look over these new routes.

The people of my district do not want a cheap post-office service. That is the only department of the Government that comes pretty close to paying its way. What the people want is good service, and they do not care if it costs twice what it costs now, if they get good service. They are the people who need it, and I think the Post Office Department, before making these radical changes, should have sent inspectors over the district to see whether they were proper to be made. The trouble is that the routes were made by clerks in the department here from blue prints, and I could not take a blue print and lay out a postal route in my own county that would be satisfactory to the people. The only way it could be done would be to go upon the ground. [Applause.]

In a general way the Post Office Department has rendered satisfactory service, so far as I know. I can speak for my home county. No more gentlemanly officials have, to my knowledge, served as postmasters. They are intelligent, courteous, and possibly partisan in their politics; but I have never counted that as a fault, so that the partisanship is not offensive and does not affect the efficiency of the official. The partisanship of the present post-office officials in the district I represent, so far as I have personal knowledge, does not affect their efficiency.

What I object to is that the changes made in the rural routes, particularly in my home county, have been injurious to the service, and in many instances patrons on the routes put to great inconvenience in receiving their mail. In many instances patrons who, before these changes were made, received their mail from the city near their homes, where they did all their trading, their express, freight, and telegraph business, now receive it from a village several miles from their homes, a village where they never had, and do not now have, any commercial business. One typical illustration: A Mr. McLean has a fruit and truck farm. He lives near Greenville, a town of 6,000 to 8,000 inhabitants. Three railroads pass through the town. He sold to the people of the town or shipped from the town his produce. The change made last summer started his mail from a small village on the main line of one of the three railroads. Greenville is his shipping, express, and telegraph point, and the place where he transacts all his business. To extend a route, now starting from Greenville, less than one-half mile would give him his mail from Greenville. I have gone to the department once and written three times to get some relief, but have failed.

I do not believe the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General refuses relief in the many cases I have asked for relief out of political reasons or because he does not wish to accommodate my constituents; he refuses because of false notions of economy. Every department of the Government is a burden on the citizen. It takes money out of his pocket and returns nothing. Every man, woman, and child that mails a letter contributes to the Government and gets some return. I wish I could persuade the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General to cultivate a larger vision and be more generous in the administration of his great office.

Mr. STEENERSON. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. RICKETTS].

Mr. RICKETTS. Mr. Chairman, a very large part of my district is agricultural, and my people are generally opposed to this new scheme, which has curtailed the rural service. In the last 10 days I have simply been deluged with letters with reference to this matter. I wrote the department about it and tried to get some information regarding it. It was 10 days before I could get an answer, and the answer was entirely evasive and unsatisfactory.

Mr. Chairman, I do not wonder at the heated debate upon the floor of this House in relation to the rural system. The old system was entirely, and almost universally, satisfactory to everybody. It was practical and efficient and has had much to do with putting the country districts in touch with the world and current events of history. These rural routes were originally laid out by inspectors who went upon and over the ground and took pains to select such territory as would supply the greatest number of people with mail and at the same time keeping in mind the condition of the roads throughout the year over which the route was to be established.

The new scheme of the department is impractical, unsatisfactory, and has met with the condemnation and disapproval of a very large per cent of the patrons where the new scheme has been put into operation. It is regrettable, indeed, to think that the Post Office Department would undertake to force and foist upon the people a rural delivery system that was impracticable and unsatisfactory. The rural carriers have established the fact that they are men of character and integrity throughout the Nation; that they have at heart only to render the very best service of which they are capable to the patrons of their respective rural routes. Their service has been efficient in every way, and to their credit it may be said that very few, if any, of the rural carriers have been criticized for dishonesty or lack of service. In the sleet and snow, in the rain and in sunshine, day after day, they have performed their duties, without a murmur or complaint, and it has been the policy of Congress to increase their pay from year to year in proportion to and commensurate with the service rendered.

The Post Office Department, disregarding the appropriation made last year for this service, has undertaken to divert and thwart that appropriation by substituting this new scheme of rural service, which is a serious blow at the very vitals of this Nation, for this service is vitally important to each and every citizen of the Nation.

Several items of new legislation are reported in the Post Office bill, but the Rural Delivery Service is ignored. The chairman and several members of the Post Office Committee have tacitly agreed to consider and report a special bill covering this feature of the Postal Service. To many of the Members of this House who are deeply interested in the subject this seems to be a perilous recourse.

When it is considered that a very large amount of important legislation is yet to be enacted, and in view of the fact that every effort will be made to bring this session of Congress to a close as early as possible, it seems extremely doubtful whether or not any further postal bills could be considered and passed. Therefore it has seemed to the House that the only safe course that could be pursued, in order to protect the rural system and Rural Free Delivery Service, is by the adoption of amendments to the present Post Office appropriation bill, which we are now considering, covering rural-delivery legislation. Some eight or nine amendments have been offered along this line, many of which are pertinent and would protect this service if enacted into law.

It is evident that a large number of the Members of Congress from different districts throughout the United States are favorable to this legislation, but it seems to have been the intention of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads to raise the point of order, with reference to these amendments, and thereby defeat them.

The Rural Delivery System is a great public service, in which the people of the country districts and the people of the city districts are mutually interested.

Rural delivery has been in operation for about 20 years, and the experience gained in all that time has proven that for satisfactory service a horse and wagon route should not exceed approximately 24 miles in length. The value of rural mail delivery is based, primarily, upon the regularity of the service, and no route should be of greater length than will permit the observance of regular schedules at all seasons of the year, and especially is this necessary if parcel post is to fulfill the expectations of Congress. As a matter of fact, long routes requiring 8, 10, or 12 hours for carriers to cover are among the serious hindrances to the development of Parcel Post Service, for the obvious reason that the longer the route the greater the time of delivery from the shipper to the consignee, therefore the greater risk to farm products by breakage and decay.

Seven months' experience with 50 or 60 mile motor routes has demonstrated the practical failure of that service to give satisfaction to the patrons, and such routes should be prohibited, except, possibly, in territories where the entire length could be made up of hard-surfaced roads. There are but few miles of this character of road in this country.

In the district that I have the honor to represent the department is now proposing to motorize the rural service, and thus render it less efficient.

The present policy of the Post Office Department in abolishing a large number of routes, and attempting to cover that territory with the remaining routes, has proven a serious hardship to rural-delivery patrons. Generally speaking, that policy is designed to economize in the cost of the service. The department claims to have greatly extended the service under its reorganization scheme, but the official figures show that on July 1, 1913, there were 42,805 routes in operation. On July 1, 1915, there were 43,866 routes, while on December 1, 1915, there were only 42,993 routes, making a net decrease for the preceding five months of 873 routes, and a total net increase for the two years and five months, from July, 1913, to December, 1915, of only 188 routes. Hence it is plain that if the department's claim of an extension is correct, it has been at the cost of much extra labor to rural carriers by extended routes of already 24 miles or more in length to, in some cases, 30 miles or more, without additional compensation, and resulting, in many instances, in serious delay in the delivery of the mail.

Another item of legislation which should be taken care of is the matter of back pay due the rural carriers for the fiscal year 1915. The amount involved was appropriated by Congress in March, 1914, and when the bill was passed Congress intended that the Postmaster General should follow the old-established basis in awarding the increased pay. But instead a new basis was devised, which deprived more than 37,000 rural carriers of a substantial part, and a large number of rural carriers of the entire amount, of the increase intended by Congress. When the House learned of the Postmaster General's action in August, 1914, prompt steps were taken and a bill was passed directing the department to adjust the carriers' salaries in accordance with the intention of Congress. That bill was held up in the Senate until the close of the Sixty-third Congress, and the House is now being urged to repeat its enactment of August, 1914, and direct the Postmaster General to pay the carriers the amounts withheld.

As before stated, the appropriation has already been made and is still unexpended and available. No further appropriations will be required, and it is only necessary to direct the Postmaster General to obey the will of Congress.

Why is it that the Post Office Department has not carried out the intention and requirements of Congress? Why is it that the department should ignore Congress, which is made up of the Representatives of the people? Should not the will of the people, through Congress, be carried out? Has the Post Office Department the right to abrogate and disregard and ignore the demands of the American people, as made through their Representatives in Congress? The answer is for you.

Mr. Chairman, there is another matter that I want to call to your attention, and that is the fact that in this new scheme of reorganizing the Rural Free Delivery System the new routes were not inspected personally by representatives of the Post Office Department, but, in many instances—in fact, in most instances—these new routes were mapped out in the Post Office Department by clerks under salary, who obtained their information from reprints and from suggestions made by postmasters who are in harmony with the present scheme of the present Post Office Department to reorganize the Rural Free Delivery System. The patrons of the free-delivery routes were not consulted. They were not given a chance to express an opinion one way or the other with reference to the new change that was proposed or to make any suggestions with reference to the efficiency of the present service. In other words, the Post Office Department has arbitrarily adopted a new scheme of rural free-delivery service without having first learned or even attempted to learn whether or not the new scheme would meet with the approbation of those who were to be affected by its enforcement.

This department undertakes to say that the purpose of the new scheme is economy. I want to say to you, Mr. Chairman and gentleman of the committee, that, in my judgment, this sort of economy could be well denominated "false economy."

I want to call the attention of this committee to one letter that I received from one of the constituents of the district which I have the honor to represent, in which he says, and I quote him:

> Let me say to you that during my 10 years of experience as postmaster of this city, during which time a county rural service was laid out and made effective for my county, there are 10 routes established emanating from this post office, and it will be absolutely impractical to motorize any of them. I doubt if there is a single one of them that can be joined with another route and give to the patrons as good service as they are now receiving and have received for the past 10 years.

He further says in this letter to me:

> I know every foot of the 10 routes that leave the county seat and post office of my county, and I am writing you in the interest not only of the local carriers but in the interest of the citizens who are patrons of these various routes and who are now enjoying the benefit of rural free-delivery mail service. The most of these patrons are now benefited by this service, and to attempt the use of motors would lessen the number and bring about dissension, disagreement, and trouble for the management of the local office.

He further says:

> I have no interest in this matter except to see the present service maintained with the same efficiency as it has been maintained in the past.

This is only one of hundreds of letters that I have received opposing this new scheme.

And in conclusion, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I want to say that I am willing to vote for any one of these amendments which will protect the Rural Free Delivery System for the people of the district which I have the honor to represent and for the people of the Nation as well. [Applause.]

Mr. STEENERSON. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BROWNE].

Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I am heartily in favor of the Towner and Candler amendments. I can not see why the rural service should not be extended. When we think that in some of the larger cities they have mail deliveries, even in the residence districts, numbering seven in a day and in the business portions nine deliveries in a day, it seems as if our rural population ought to have at least reasonable facilities for getting their mail. All of them certainly have not reasonable facilities at the present time.

I believe, Mr. Chairman, that the rural free delivery is of mutual benefit to the inhabitants of the city and the country.

When rural delivery of mail is extended the way I hope to see it some day it will bring sixty millions of people who dwell in the cities in quick communication with the forty millions of people who dwell in the country, to the advantage and profit of both.

Our rural free delivery began in a small way in the year 1896, in the McKinley administration. James A. Gary was Postmaster General. It was a belated reform, and there is no reason why the people should not have had it 25 years before they did.

The rural delivery of mail was a success from the start, and the service has been extended very rapidly, and the people were somewhat surprised when it was understood that a sweeping reorganization of the Rural Delivery Service throughout the United States was to be made and that many rural routes were to be discontinued.

If the Towner amendment is adopted it means that there shall be no halt in the extension of our rural delivery, but that it shall be extended.

I, for one, do not believe in going backward in a great movement that has proven such a wonderful disseminator of knowledge and medium for the extension of business and has given as much satisfaction and happiness to such a large and deserving part of our population.

THERE SHOULD BE A MAIL BOX IN FRONT OF EVERY HOME.

I will not be satisfied until our Rural Delivery Service is extended so that there will be a mail box in front of every home in this land and an opportunity for the daily delivery of mail to every citizen.

The residents of small cities, some of them less than 3,000 inhabitants, have their mail delivered three or four times a day in the business portions and at least twice a day in the residence portions, notwithstanding the fact that 90 per cent of the business men in most of such cities could get their mail at the post office with very little inconvenience.

The most remote inhabitant of the large cities has his mail delivered at his door several times a day, although he may reside 8 or 10 miles from the post office, and even in some residence districts in large cities, as I have stated, there are as high as seven deliveries of mail a day.

In some of our large cities mail is shot through pneumatic tubes at an expense to the Government of $976,000 per year.

No question is raised about expense, nor should be, for giving the most perfect service to the inhabitant of the city, whether he be a taxpayer or not. But when we ask for an extension of the rural routes and the establishment of new ones to accommodate taxpaying farmers that are obliged to travel from 1 to 3 miles for their mail we are met by the cry of economy—the same cry that we hear when we ask for national aid for our rural highways.

Our farmers work the hardest and the longest hours per day of any of our citizens.

The eight hours a day observed by most of our farming population means eight hours in the forenoon and eight hours in the afternoon, at the end of which time they ought not to be obliged to go a couple of miles to get their mail.

PARCEL POST.

The parcel post has been of inestimable benefit to the people, and the present Postmaster General and the Post Office Department are deserving of great praise for the way in which they handle it.

The parcel post has not only accommodated millions of people and saved them money, but it has made business and advanced our general prosperity.

In 1912, the year before the establishment of the parcel post, the express companies carried 317,000,000 packages, which was a little over 3 packages per person for the total population of the United States. They received for this an average rate of 50 cents per package.

In 1915 these same express companies carried 280,000,000 pieces, at 24 cents per piece, while the parcel post carried 400,000,000 packages, at 14 cents per piece, not counting packages of less than 1 pound. Thus, there were 373,000,000 more packages carried after the parcel post was established than before, which shows how it increased business, how it brought millions of people together in business and trade that were unable to do business with each other through the medium of the express companies. In other words, the express companies killed almost as much business as they transacted. Take these figures I have quoted and see how the express companies have lowered their rates since the parcel post and see what a saving the parcel post has been to the people.

They say that the Government can not do business as cheaply as an individual. I am reliably informed that the Government is handling packages by parcel post at just one-half what it costs the express companies. The use of the simple postage stamp, a Government device, does away with the services of thousands of bookkeepers. The Government pays higher wages to its post-office employees than the express companies, but its business methods are far ahead, which accounts for the cheapness of the service.

PARCEL POST NOT ACCESSIBLE TO PEOPLE LIVING OFF FROM RURAL ROUTES.

Anyone who lives one-half mile or more from a rural route is practically cut off from the use of the parcel post.

An extension of the rural routes would greatly increase the business of the parcel post. This would be a great benefit to both the dwellers in the city as well as the country.

The parcel post has been not only a great blessing to the people, but it has been more than self-supporting. The Government has made money from it as a revenue producer.

Every day more people are availing themselves of the benefits of the parcel post, and the more it is extended the greater the revenues of the Government will be.

I believe the extension of rural free delivery will broaden and greatly increase the usefulness of the parcel post.

I also believe that Government aid for rural post roads will also materially increase the usefulness of the parcel post.

Improvement of our rural roads and extension of our rural free delivery, in my mind, will benefit the people more than anything that has been done for them by the Government in a generation.

The farmers in all sections of the United States are demanding that this Government appropriate money for these two great national improvements.

There is no more important person measured in influence upon the life of the Nation than the farmer. He has been called the "nation builder." Every year he produces about $10,000,000,000 worth of wealth. His products not only supply the demands of a home market, but find their way abroad to turn the balance of trade in our favor and bring to our shores the golden stream of wealth. Upon the farmers' prosperity depends the prosperity of the Nation.

In a country like ours, where we all labor together to produce the national wealth and all share the burdens of taxation, all are therefore entitled to all the national conveniences and advantages.

The farmer is as much entitled to the daily delivery of mail as the dweller in the city. It is not only a matter of right but a matter of national importance, in a people's Government like ours, that the 40,000,000 of people residing in the rural districts should have direct and immediate communication with the 60,000,000 of people who dwell in the cities; that information on all subjects, books, newspapers, market reports, and so forth, should circulate quickly throughout the land; that no home in America should be so remote that it is not visited daily by a United States letter carrier.

MAIL CARRIERS.

While I am upon this subject I want to say a word about our rural mail carriers. I have had the opportunity of meeting a great many farmers in going through my district and have made inquiry about the kind of treatment they were getting from our rural mail carriers, and I have heard no complaint, but much praise.

I know personally most every rural carrier in my district and have met with them at their gatherings both in the district and State, and they are men of excellent habits—a sturdy, industrious, intelligent, and efficient body of men.

When you consider that each rural carrier on an average has to keep three horses, or the equivalent, and other equipment, the depreciation and the upkeep reduces the salary received so that it only amounts to a living wage.

I am utterly opposed to ever resorting to the contract system, the way the Government did in carrying our mail on the star routes. If we did it would mean that a few contractors would make themselves rich out of their contracts, and the men that did the work would have to do it below cost and could not give us efficient service. There is no more reason for adopting such a system in regard to rural mail carriers than city mail carriers or other Government employees, and can not be justified. I believe that the recommendation of the Post Office Department in this respect is unwise.

GOVERNMENT OWES RURAL CARRIERS.

If the Candler amendment passes, the rural carriers will get the full pay the Government promised them. There was $3,189,724.27 of the appropriation made by Congress in the Post Office appropriation bill of 1915. In the bill which passed Congress March, 1914, provision was made for an increased compensation for rural carriers from $1,100 to $1,200 per year for the fiscal year 1915. The Postmaster General adopted a new basis of compensation July, 1914, four months after the appropriation was passed, which resulted in withholding from the carriers $3,189,724.37 that Congress had voted them. This amount of money is due these men. The bill referred to giving the carriers this amount is worded exactly the same as all previous bills increasing the compensation of rural carriers, and if the amendment presented by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CANDLER] prevails it will not add a dollar to this appropriation; it will simply direct the Postmaster General to make the payments in accordance with a law passed by Congress two years ago.

After Congress passed this law granting them an increase many carriers improved their equipment so they could render the public better service.

If a person in business violated a contract with an employee, like this great Government has done in this case, such a person not only would be liable legally but such business morality would drive them out of the community.

I sincerely hope that the amendment will pass and that these deserving Government employees will be given what Congress voted to give them.

Mr. STEENERSON. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER].

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, the people whom I represent are largely found in two separate communities, one a city, the other a mining district, and yet in addition I have quite an extended area that is being rapidly filled up by settlers and farmers.

During recent years in these rapidly growing and developing communities they have constructed excellent roads and entered upon the work of complying with all the requirements of the Post Office Department for rural routes. During the past two years inspectors came and inspected several of them, recommending their establishment, but I got a reply in every instance that the department could not establish the rural routes because of lack of funds. That continued up until this summer, according to my best information, when I found to my surprise that $3,000,000 of the fund appropriated for the purpose was turned back into the Treasury. I also found that in adjoining communities, as well as in my own, some of the rural routes heretofore established have been curtailed and injured. I say this attack upon the Rural Mail Service among the farming population of the United States is a dastardly outrage committed by the present administration of the Post Office Department, and it is up to the Members of this House to put upon it the stamp of their strong disapproval. [Applause.]

Mr. STEENERSON. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. HOPWOOD].

Mr. HOPWOOD. Mr. Chairman, in my district we had a very satisfactory rural service until, as my friend Judge MILLER said, it was blue printed from this end of the line and 7 carriers in the county were put out of the service, reducing it from 32 to 25 rural carriers in the county. The result was that many of the districts were necessarily enlarged, and many roads where rural service had theretofore been given were cut out entirely, making the people go half a mile away from their front gates, where they had been getting their mail, to some other road.

In some cases 20 families were cut out and they were compelled to go to some crossroads corner half a mile away, where 20 or 30 boxes would be placed, to get their mail. The service has been very unsatisfactory since then, and I have received more letters and had more trouble about the rural service than any other one thing since I came to represent that district. So, therefore, I want to add my word of disapprobation to this method of saving a little money in this rural service by cutting out the very best thing that the country people can get from the Government. The people, both in the country and in the city, should get the very best possible mail service that can be given to them. [Applause.]

While I am in favor of an economical administration of all governmental affairs, I do not think that our people desire a cheap Postal Service at the expense of an efficient and prompt delivery of the mails.

This Nation having once established a rural mail delivery can not afford to restrict or limit that service, but should, from year to year, advance and render such service better and more efficient.

I realize that our friends on the other side are struggling to keep down the deficit brought about by their destructive tariff legislation and do not care to carry out the program outlined by the President to lay additional stamp taxes, commonly designated as war taxes, to keep the Treasury from becoming bankrupt, so they are compelled to resort to such measures as this to save a few dollars.

Let our farmers and people living in country districts have increased mail facilities instead of curtailing that they have heretofore had.

Mr. STEENERSON. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FOCHT].

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Chairman, as this seems to be a rural-delivery experience meeting in regard to the service the farmers are receiving, or rather not receiving, I want to add a word and say that I have also had correspondence with the department in regard to the inefficient delivery in my district. Numerous petitions of protest have been sent in, also hundreds of letters, and I have received from the department very courteous replies, many of them couched in choicest and rarest diction, indeed often voluminous, but not yet in any single instance did I receive any results for my constituents. I want to say in this brief minute that not only Republicans are finding fault with this restricted service, but many Democrats also, and I wish to here read into the RECORD a letter written by a life-long Democrat as indicating the widespread feeling of indignation among all parties in my district. [Applause.]

LEWISBURG, PA., February 24, 1916.

Hon. BENJAMIN K. FOCHT,
The Champlain, 1424 K Street NW., Washington, D. C.:

Replying to your telegram, the following letter appeared in the Saturday News, September 18, 1915:

"As your editor is our Congressman, I beg of him to try and have our rural mail routes restored as they had been prior to September 15, 1915. Under a ruling of the Post Office Department a number of us who are patrons of the Mifflinburg rural route will now be served by the carriers of the Lewisburg rural routes. I find that all the patrons are very much dissatisfied with this change. Instead of people getting their mail at 8.30 a. m., we will not get it until 10.30 a. m. or later. Then again, when the roads get bad in the fall and winter it will be impossible for the rural carriers to get around to all the patrons, as they can not travel with their autos when there is snow on the ground, and you know how our roads drift in our section of the State, and there are many other reasons. The Mifflinburg post office will lose 108 families who are patrons now and who will be served from Lewisburg. A number of patrons will be obliged to move their mail boxes to the main highways, quite a distance from their homes. The reason for this is because the carriers who passed over some roads and retraced so people could be properly served will not dare go in those roads.

"I wrote a letter to the Post Office Department protesting against this change, but without avail. They seem to think they know better what the people need than we do who have lived here all our lives.

"Our rural delivery was in a fine condition, with all patrons satisfied. Route No. 1, out of Mifflinburg, has been in existence since 1905. I was one of the prime movers to have this route established, which took a lot of time to accomplish, and now when it is in such fine working condition, with a carrier who has always done his duty toward his patrons, and he has not, to our knowledge, made one error in the many money orders he handled for us, we are turned down, and to make such a ruling is to demoralize the only thing we country people have as a convenience.

"The farmer is the backbone of the country and needs his daily mail the same as the city man does his, and I pray of you when next Congress meets to bring this before the House and have us put back where we were.

"Having been a rock-ribbed Jeffersonian Democrat all my life and voted for 35 years and never missed an election in that time, I have always worked hard to get our men elected, but with defeat after defeat nothing hurt me as much as this unjust ruling of the Post Office Department. Had they sent on an inspector here over these routes before they concluded to make this change, he would have said this change was not necessary, but if the majority of the people would have told him they wanted this change, why then we would be satisfied.

"I hope you will give this matter attention and that we country people will be served as in the good old times of the past.

"Yours, respectfully,

"HARRY W. SPANGLER.

"Lewisburg, Pa., R. F. D. 1, instead of Mifflinburg, Pa., R. F. D. 1."

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, I have used up all of my time, and I will state to the gentleman from Tennessee that I would like to have two minutes more if I can.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I am glad to find that the gentleman is in that situation. I now yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK].

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I yield first to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS].

Mr. SAUNDERS. Mr. Chairman, if I were asked to point out the greatest boon that national legislation has conferred upon the farmers during the last 20 years, I would promptly and unhesitatingly reply: "Rural Delivery Service." Not only is this service of inestimable value in itself, but it is responsible for another great service which was impossible of attainment until the way was prepared by the establishment of the rural delivery routes. I refer of course to the Parcel Post Service. The branch of governmental activities which operates this twin service, has disseminated knowledge, extended business, and afforded satisfaction, and happiness, to a large class of our citizens. From the very beginning rural delivery demonstrated its utility. It grew in popular favor, not by slow and tedious steps, but by leaps and bounds, so that it has been difficult for the Government to meet the clamorous and ever-insistent demands of the public for extensions, and improvements in the service. Great however as have been the improvements in rural delivery, wonderful as are the present facilities afforded in the rural communities, they fall far short of the conveniences, and opportunities provided for the residents of the cities. Practically every man in these cities has his mail delivered at his doors more than once a day, although in the larger cities he may live many miles from the post office. For the convenient, and expeditious handling of the mail in some of these cities expensive pneumatic tubes have been laid, through which the mail is shot at great expense to the Government but to the vast advantage of the service. Still the farmers do not begrudge these facilities to the urban dwellers. They recognize that owing to the comparatively small area of the cities, and the superior condition of their streets, improved facilities can be provided for the city people at a reasonable cost, when the cost of the same facilities under country conditions, would be prohibitive.

But while the country people, with that reasonableness which has always characterized them, are not insisting that they should be provided with the same facilities, which are enjoyed by their more fortunate brethren in the cities, yet they do insist that the present rural facilities both with respect to mails, and parcels, should be continually expanded, and extended. At this time when Congress is being asked to appropriate gigantic sums to meet remote, and improbable contingencies, the farmers are agreed that their interests should be advanced by adequate appropriations for the three great national improvements of a domestic character, to wit: Rural delivery, parcel post, and Government-aided rural roads. These three improvements are tied, and linked together in the most intimate fashion. They are interdependent, and mutually sustaining. Rural delivery made possible parcel post. Better roads will make possible undreamed of developments in the extension of both rural mail delivery, and parcel delivery. Improve the system of rural mail delivery, and you improve its yokemate, the parcel post. Improve rural roads, and you make possible vast improvements in rural delivery service. Improve the roads, rural delivery, and parcel post, and you improve the conditions of life in the rural districts. Improve the general conditions of life in the rural communities, and you will confer far-reaching benefits upon both the residents of the cities, and of the country. The farmers are entitled to an improved service on the rural routes, for the very simple and obvious reason that with better service, he will secure better information upon the subjects in which he is interested, and with better information, more promptly afforded, he will be in an improved position to deal intelligently with his own immediate affairs, as well as with the larger affairs of the Nation. I agree fully with the statement that there is no more important person, measured in influence upon the life of the Nation, than the farmer. He has been called the "nation builder." Every year he produces about $10,000,000,000 worth of wealth. His products not only supply the home market, but find their way abroad to turn the balance of trade in our favor, and bring to our shores the golden streams of wealth. Upon the farmer's prosperity depends the prosperity of the Nation.

I give my fullest assent to this thought. It has been stated in another form. "Burn down your cities," said a great orator, and they will be rebuilt. Destroy the producing capacity of your farms, and grass will grow in the streets of your proudest cities. The farmer of to-day is reading more than his father, or his grandfather. He is no longer satisfied with a weekly paper that he had to send perchance 10 miles to secure. He wants his daily market reports, and is entitled to them, he wants his daily paper, his magazines, his information on all subjects. In a measure, he is securing these things through the present routes, but he desires them to be more abundantly, and expeditiously afforded through improvements, and extensions of his service. The figures of the parcel post are astounding. This service "has made business, and advanced general prosperity." Hundreds of thousands of farmers who were formerly hindered by location, and distance from using the express routes, are now receiving a better and cheaper service through the medium of the parcel post. The figures which I cite below, are instructive, and impressive. "In 1912, the year before the parcel post went into effect, the express companies carried, in round numbers, 317,000,000 packages, or a little over three packages per person, for the total population of the United States. They received for this an average rate of 50 cents per package. In 1915 the same companies carried 280,000,000 pieces, at 24 cents per piece. Note the saving to the public in this item of cost. For the same year, the parcel post carried 400,000,000 packages, at 14 cents per package not counting packages of less than a pound." Thus through the medium of the parcel post, how many thousands of people have been brought into business relations, not only to the advantage of the parties immediately concerned, but of the whole business world. Whenever general business activity is promoted, action, and interaction is stimulated in unexpected directions, employment is afforded, wages are caused to be paid, and a state of general civic betterment is brought to pass.

But while the farmers are interested in the continual expansion and development of the Rural Mail Service, they are also interested in the regularity and efficiency of that service, once it is established. Indeed regularity is one prime element of efficiency. Within the last six or eight months the Post Office Department has conducted somewhat extensive experiments in motorizing the service in various States. These experiments have affected both the carriers and the public. They have affected the carriers for the reason that many routes have been consolidated, thereby eliminating many carriers. They have affected the public for the reason that consolidations have been effected through rearrangements and changes in the location of the routes. These changes may have been an inevitable sequence of the use of motors, or inevitably required in order that motors might be used, but none the less as a result of these rearrangements the last state of many patrons of the routes affected was far worse than their former condition. Many persons who were immediately on the old routes find themselves perchance a mile or more from the new routes. Moreover, another feature of these rearrangements has been to transfer the starting point of the new route to a strange office. Of course in time this would adjust itself, but for a while certainly such a change will be an interruption and inconvenience to the regularity of service to the individual patron, whose correspondents through years have been accustomed to write to him at a familiar and long-established office. Moreover, regularity of service on a route is of the essence in another particular.

The patrons of a route who are not within sight of their boxes are concerned to know within a few minutes when the carrier will arrive at their respective boxes, in order to know when to meet him both with respect to incoming and outgoing mail. It is no little trouble, inconvenience and at times loss, to send a messenger with mail to a box a half mile, or a mile away, only to find that the carrier has passed, or perchance will not arrive for a half hour, or more as a result of delays on the route. Now the carriers on the horse served routes, are soon able to serve their routes, except under extraordinary conditions with almost clocklike regularity. The patrons know to within a few minutes, when their respective boxes will be served, and are therefore able to make their arrangements accordingly. Ordinary rain, snow, or mud, may be disagreeable to the carriers, but are merely negligible interruptions to his service. But these conditions are entirely changed when the ordinary dirt roads are undertaken to be served by motor cars throughout the year. For a good portion of the time the service may be satisfactory. A carrier with a modern motor car when the roads are dry, even though bad, can serve a 50-mile route more readily and expeditiously than he can serve a 25-mile route on horseback, or with a horse-drawn vehicle.

But when winter sets in throughout the greater portion of the United States, motor service is seriously interrupted, if not rendered impossible, on most of our roads. In one section this interruption may be caused by mud, in another by snow. Frequently it is a combination of both that makes trouble for the carrier. The CONGRESSIONAL RECORD is filled with protests from patrons of routes which have been rearranged, lengthened, and motorized. Many patrons who were immediately on the former routes, complain of the inconvenience of the present service, as it immediately affects them under the present conditions. Others whose location on the route has not been changed, complain of the irregularity of the service afforded. This question of motorization is really a question of roads. Conceivably in some communities blessed with first-class roads, the motor car can be used to the same advantage, and with the same facility that it is used in the cities. I freely admit that the Government should utilize every agency that will enable it to provide the public with a more efficient, extensive and economical service. In time the horse-drawn vehicle may go, just as in time dirt roads will be superseded by hard roads. But these ideals belong to the distant future. Theory should not outrun the teachings of experience, or the limitations of actual conditions.

The public generally have been satisfied with the service afforded on the rural routes. They are eager for extensions, and improvements in that service, but experiments looking to improvements should be patiently and thoroughly tried out on a limited scale, and under the test of actual conditions, before any extensive rearrangements of the present routes are undertaken. Reduced and irregular service in the name of economy, is poor economy, and will create intense dissatisfaction upon the routes affected. Motor service on many of the routes if proposed to be operated during the entire period of the year, is an impossibility, unless the ideal of regularity is proposed to be abandoned. An irregular service, for the reasons that have been given, will be unsatisfactory. The carriers take a pride in their work, difficult and exacting as it is, at times. They are pleased when their patrons are pleased. They are pleased when they complete their schedules on time, and are willing to spare no efforts, to maintain the service on a high scale of efficiency. They know what they can do with their present routes and their present equipment. They have thoroughly tried them out. They also know from hard experience, the actual conditions on their routes, and whether motor cars are feasible under average country conditions. Many of the carriers are buying cars, for use on their present routes during the entire summer, and portions of the spring and fall, but on these routes, when weather or road conditions are forbidding, they return to the use of the horse.

But before routes are disarranged, and relocated, and the service rendered irregular, and unsatisfactory, the actual conditions of those routes should be carefully studied on the ground, the suggestions of the carriers, should be received, and the patrons consulted. It is poor economy to eliminate faithful carriers, and consolidate routes, when the immediate result of the change is inferior and irregular service. The public, and the carriers will welcome improvements, but every suggested change, however plausible it may appear when worked out on paper, is not of necessity an improvement. The fable of the dog who dropped a juicy piece of meat, in order to secure the shadow that he saw in the water, is in point in this connection. The present service is a good and satisfactory one. By the way of rearrangements, and extensions, it is being continually improved. No rash, or hasty experiments should be made. Above all listen to what the public has to say, before action is taken. If they say: "Let well enough alone"; take that advice, unless you are very sure that you have something better, something that under the test of actual conditions will be readily proved to be better. In that event, the public will be prompt to accept and approve the change. They know as well as anyone, a good thing when they see it. But it is well to, "Be sure that you are right" before proceeding with innovations upon established and satisfactory conditions.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I have offered two amendments, and as the point of order has been made to both of them I desire to read them and call the attention of the Chair to some authorities. The first amendment I offered is as follows:

On page 27, line 6, after the word "stations," insert the words:
"And provided further, That no part of the money herein appropriated for Rural Delivery Service shall be used to cover any expense upon any motor-vehicle route until a majority of the patrons to be served by such motor-vehicle route shall, by written petition, ask the Post Office Department to establish such motor-vehicle route."

I have offered the second amendment because if the first be defeated I want it adopted. The second amendment reads as follows:

Page 27, line 6, after the word "stations," insert the words:
"And provided further, That no part of the money herein appropriated for Rural Delivery Service shall be used in payment of any expense upon any motor vehicle route more than 35 miles in length."

Of course, if the first amendment is adopted, I shall ask leave to withdraw the second amendment. A point of order has been made to both amendments. I insist that the point is not well taken as to either of them; that both of them are limitations upon an appropriation and come well within the rule. I desire to call the attention of the Chair to Hinds' Precedents, volume 4, page 671. A bill was pending, and certain amendments were offered. One amendment was offered by Mr. Macon, of Arkansas, which was held to be out of order. Reference to that will be found at the bottom of page 669. On page 671 the language occurs:

A little later Mr. JOHN J. FITZGERALD, of New York, proposed to the same paragraph the following amendment:
"Provided, That no part of the amount hereby appropriated shall be expended for transporting coal between New York, N. Y., and Manila, P. I., at a rate greater than $5 a ton."

The Chairman stated that he "inclined to the opinion that this was a limitation." I proposed to call the attention of the Chair to the analogy between that amendment and the amendment which I offer. The amendment offered by Mr. FITZGERALD was to an act relating to vessels carrying goods, and his amendment sought to fix a limitation on the amount they could charge; that is to say that it should not be greater than $5 a ton. In this pending bill a large amount of money is appropriated for Rural Delivery Mail Service, and I propose by my amendment to fix a limitation to the effect that none of the money so appropriated shall be used for motor-vehicle routes unless those routes shall be established in a particular way; that is to say that a majority of the patrons to be served shall first ask for the establishment of the route—purely, it occurs to me, a limitation upon the expenditures proposed to be made. I have not the time to read them all, but I think the Chair will find a number of decisions supporting the contention I am making. I am willing to admit that the decisions are not altogether uniform; but a very large number of decisions hold, and it seems to me the great weight of authority is to the effect that where the Congress appropriates money, it has the right to attach conditions to the expenditures of that money. With that statement as to the point of order I want now to call attention briefly to the merits of the proposition.

In my State, Mr. Chairman, and particularly in my district, what we call the flatwoods roads in the dry seasons of the year are the best roads in the country, but during the rainy season, which begins along in June and lasts for three or four months, those roads are simply overflowed, and it is utterly impossible for the three or four months of the year mentioned for a motor vehicle to traverse those roads at all, and yet these motor routes have been established on roads of that character. The routes have been laid out into motor-vehicle routes, as some gentleman suggested, by blue prints, maps, and things of that sort by employees here in Washington, but even if an inspector had gone to my district and gone over a road in the dry time, he could not have told anything about the condition of the road after the rainy season began in that State, and we always have three or four months when it rains every day. Now, I have made appeals to the department. I have sent petition after petition to the department, letter after letter, and protest after protest from the people who live in the community, who know the roads; from the country physician who travels the roads and knows the roads better than any other living man, because no man knows the country roads of his community better than the country physician, and yet in face of all these protests and petitions, the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General, directed, I presume, by the underlings who claim to have made these investigations, simply says that a motor-vehicle service can be maintained there. We know it can not be, because we know the roads and we know the condition of them; and in one instance in my district, in one county, they have consolidated two routes and established a motor route in lieu of them, by which 40 families who had theretofore been receiving mail on the two rural horse-drawn vehicle routes were absolutely cut out of all mail altogether, except the star route, and it is well known that you can not buy stamps from a star-route mail carrier, and you can not purchase money orders, and you can not have a number of things done which a rural carrier can do for you.

Now, on that particular route I have constituents who for 40 and 50 years have been getting their mail addressed to them at a little office called Aucilla. Those people are now informed that their post-office address is hereafter to be Monticello, miles away from Aucilla. There is a sentiment clinging to a post office with these old people, Mr. Chairman, and I think as long as they have not removed their places of residence their post-office address should not be changed without their consent. I believe that every American citizen should have the absolute right to say himself where his mail shall be addressed, but the Post Office Department assumes to itself the right to take away from him the privilege of having his own post office and tells him he must hereafter get his mail at another place.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I hope that this amendment that I have offered will prevail. I want to appeal to those gentlemen upon the floor who have been professing their love for the farmer day after day and week after week and term after term of Congress; I want to appeal to them to help him now while they have got the chance to help him, and if they will put this amendment in the bill they will put it in the hands of the people themselves. And let me ask what possible objection can there be to allowing these routes to be established only upon petition by the patrons to be served by the routes? It seems to me there can be none, and I make this appeal in behalf of the farmers of this land, who deserve the best at the hands of this Government.

Mr. Chairman, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. HASTINGS]. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the subject matter contained in the amendment I offered, I desire to call attention to the loose method, as it appears to me, by which these motor-vehicle routes are put into operation. The Fourth Assistant Postmaster General appears to pay no attention whatever to the wishes of the people in the community to be affected. More than that, he seems to think that the statements as to conditions made by the local people are entitled to no weight. He also seems to act upon the idea that the Member of Congress in whose district it is proposed to establish a motor-vehicle route knows nothing of road conditions in his district. All these sources of information appear to be of absolutely no value to the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General in determining the feasibility of operating a motor-vehicle route in a given community, and, having discarded them, he is left to two methods of securing his information. One is from a map and the other is from a report made by an inspector detailed for that purpose. I believe every fair man will concede that it is utterly impossible to determine the feasibility of any route to be served by a motor vehicle from an examination of a map, and I shall therefore consume no space in arguing that the map plan is not practical; and yet the map must have been used in some cases, because a distinguished Member of this body told me that in his district there was a mountain, on one side of which there was a horse-drawn vehicle rural route, and another route of the same kind on the other side of the mountain, and that the department performed the wonderful feat of consolidating these two into one motor-vehicle route.

Dismissing the proposition of establishing these routes from an examination of the map, let us consider for a moment the method of establishing motor routes on the reports of inspectors. These inspectors are generally strangers, who in the first instance know nothing, except in the most general way, about either the country they are sent to inspect or the people who live in that country, and the inspectors are generally men who do not know very much of rural life and rural conditions.

Now, one of these gentlemen is sent to a certain place to inspect and report. He reaches the place, gets a team, and rides over the road upon which it is proposed to establish the motor route, comes back to town and makes his report. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that it is utterly impossible for this man upon this superficial examination to make a report which is worth a continental. I insist that before he can make a report of any value, even if he was an experienced man in rural affairs, he must have gone over the road at the different seasons of the year and have examined it under different conditions. I know roads in my State which, under favorable conditions in the dry season, are almost as good as macadam roads, and when the rains come and flood them they are practically impassable. Why, Mr. Chairman, a few weeks ago a motor-vehicle route was established at a certain place in my district. This route was to be 50 miles in length. Three young men were certified as eligible for carrier on this route, and although the salary was $1,800 per year, every one of the three, one after another, declined to take the place. They declined because they said it was utterly impossible to operate a car over that road for that distance daily. Unfortunately in my district we have not the system of good, hard roads enjoyed by some other communities, and which we hope to have and enjoy in the near future.

Also, Mr. Chairman, unlike some other communities we are not blessed with a garage every few miles on our country roads, as some other communities are, and therefore if a carrier in my district on a 50-mile motor route should have the misfortune to have a breakdown of some kind 25 miles from home, he could not get his car to a garage, and the Lord only knows when he could deliver that mail. Under my amendment, motor routes can and will be established just as soon as the roads are so improved as to justify it.

Mr. Chairman, free rural mail delivery is a great blessing to the American farmer. For all his toil, his taxes, and his patriotic love of country, this great boon of the free delivery of his mail is about all he sees of governmental beneficence, and I beg this House to preserve it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman yields back five minutes.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes of my time, if I may, to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS].

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I believe I have control of the time, and when a gentleman leaves the floor the time belongs to me. Does the gentleman from Virginia desire to speak?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Yes, sir.

Mr. MOON. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. SAUNDERS. I will take such time as can be given me.

Mr. PARK. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. MOON. I will yield to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS] one minute.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I just want to submit a few remarks in connection with the point of order.

Mr. MOON. We had better wait for that until the gentleman from Oklahoma concludes. I yield the gentleman from Oklahoma three minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Chairman, the Post Office appropriation bill under consideration presents many questions for thoughtful inquiry. It carries an aggregate appropriation of $320,509,879. It is the largest of the appropriation bills, and appropriates more money for the Post Office Department than ever heretofore appropriated, made necessary because of the growth of the service.

For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915, there was appropriated $313,364,667 for the Postal Service, and this amount was continued by resolution for the year ending June 30, 1916. Of course, all the branches of the public service are important, and all appropriations from the Treasury should be closely scrutinized, but no other branch of our Government affects in a more personal way every citizen of this Republic.

A few days ago we passed the Indian appropriation bill, carrying in round numbers about $9,000,000. This bill is of great importance to certain States where Indians live, but every citizen in every State is keenly interested in the proper administration of the Post Office Department.

This appropriation bill is interesting also from the fact that the Post Office Department is self-sustaining. For the years 1913 and 1914 there was, in round numbers, a surplus of $4,500,000. Because of business depression incident to the war in Europe there was a deficit last year of between eleven and twelve million dollars.

GROWTH OF THE POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT.

In looking over the various items of this bill I was forcibly impressed with the growth of this department. There is not much information available concerning the Postal Service prior to 1775. Its history is divided into four periods:

First. Prior to 1693 only municipal districts existed. Letters were left at certain central places and notices posted as to when they would be collected, and private arrangements were made for their conveyance and delivery. This service was gradually extended and developed into the Postal System. The court at Boston, Mass., in 1677, upon petition of the merchants, appointed John Hayward to receive and convey letters according to directions. This is said to have been the first post office ever established, if indeed it could be called one.

In July, 1683, under an order of William Penn, a post office was established at Philadelphia, with Henry Waldy as postmaster. The mail went out once a week to certain points and the date of departure was posted in the most conspicuous places.

England had no general post offices until the act of Parliament signed June 9, 1657.

Second. The post from 1693 to 1707 was conducted under what was known as the Neale patent, which was a charter of the American post, under which the Postmaster General for America was authorized to appoint the necessary officers. Under this patent cooperation of the various Colonies was obtained and the Postal Service started in 1693, connecting the larger cities along the Atlantic coast. Riders were engaged, going from point to point over certain routes at regular stated intervals. Neale assigned the patent and all its rights to Andrew Hamilton, a man of large estates and at one time governor of Pennsylvania and New Jersey Colonies. He died in 1703. To him is largely due the establishment of the post in the Colonies. He secured concert of action among them.

The first newspaper in the Colonies was published by John Campbell at Boston in 1704, and the first issue contained the following notice:

All persons in country and town may have said news letter weekly upon reasonable terms, agreeing with John Campbell, postmaster, for the same.

No postage was required for newspapers until 1758, when an annual charge was made of 9 pence for 50 miles. Carrying mail by stage was inaugurated in 1756 between New York and Philadelphia, and from New York to Boston in 1772.

Third. In 1707 the Postal Service passed directly under the management of the General Post Office in England, and Dr. Benjamin Franklin, among others, was at one time the deputy in charge of the Post Office Department in the Colonies and had entire supervision of the service.

Fourth. The Continental Congress on July 25, 1775, provided for the appointment of a Postmaster General for the United Colonies, with a salary of $1,000 per annum, and Benjamin Franklin was unanimously elected by the Congress for one year and until his successor was appointed. This position was also held by Richard Bache, of Pennsylvania, a son-in-law of Franklin, and in 1782 by Ebenezer Hazard, of New York.

The rates of postage were fixed by the act of October 18, 1782, and distance, as well as weight, was taken into consideration in fixing the amount of postage. During the Revolutionary War rates were very largely increased, but at the close of the war they were reduced to about double the sum paid at the commencement of the war.

After the inauguration of President Washington Samuel Osgood, of Massachusetts, was appointed the first Postmaster General on September 26, 1789.

Only 75 post offices were in existence in 1789, and the amount expended for the three months up to the close of the fiscal year, June 30, 1789, was $7,560. The report of the Postmaster General shows that at the close of the fiscal year, June 30, 1915, there were 56,380 post offices throughout the United States and a gross expenditure by the department of $298,546,026. The year 1901 shows the largest number of post offices, when there were 76,945. The number has gradually decreased because of the rapid extension of the rural mail service and the appointment of rural carriers. Many of the small offices have been discontinued from time to time. The first appropriation for post offices was made in 1837 and amounted to $3,500,000. Prior to that time the disbursements were paid out of the receipts.

RURAL DELIVERY.

By the act of March 3, 1893, Congress appropriated $10,000 to experiment with the Rural Mail Delivery, but the money was not used. Another appropriation of $20,000 was made by the act of July 16, 1914, but was not used. A third appropriation was made on June 9, 1896, of $10,000. The first experimental service was established on October 1, 1896, when three routes were started in West Virginia. The service has been rapidly extended, and on June 30, 1915, there were 43,878 rural-delivery routes, operating out of 18,813 post offices, and of this number 1,180 routes were in the State of Oklahoma. Because of the consolidation of routes, the number has since been reduced to 1,085. Fifty-three rural routes are in my district.

The amount carried in this bill for Rural Delivery Service is $53,000,000. In my judgment, no appropriation is more beneficial to the people than this one. It gives to country people the same mail advantages as those enjoyed by people living in the cities and towns, and enables them to take daily and weekly papers and magazines and keep abreast of the times, so that they may become as well informed upon the current topics of the day as citizens residing in towns and cities.

This service should be greatly extended. Since being elected to Congress I have taken a very deep interest in the question of increasing the number of rural routes in my district. I have written hundreds of letters advising patrons along proposed routes that it is necessary and how to get up petitions to secure them, the number of patrons required under the rules of the department, and the number of miles regarded as a standard route. I have encouraged them to get up such petitions and forward them to the department and have cooperated with them in every way in order to secure the establishment of additional routes. When once established, the patrons along a route can be depended on to see that the roads are kept in good condition, and they will not for any reason permit a route to be discontinued.

When first established, a route delivers mail triweekly, until the report of the postmaster out of whose office the service goes shows that mail in sufficient quantities is delivered along the route to justify a daily service. A report of this kind will not be considered until the route has been in operation six months.

There are many petitions pending consideration for the establishment of new routes in my district. They have been referred to inspectors and a report is awaited in each case. The patrons along these proposed routes have been urged to see that the roads are placed in passable condition.

Inasmuch as the receipts of the Post Office Department were in excess of the disbursements prior to the outbreak of the war in Europe, and inasmuch as receipts are expected to increase over disbursements when the war is ended to an amount estimated between ten and fifteen million dollars, bills have been introduced in Congress to expend this money upon roads traversed by rural route carriers. This disposition of the money meets with my hearty approval, and while a law to this effect can not be enacted now, I sincerely hope the question will be agitated and pressed upon the attention of Congress at the close of the war, when business conditions again become normal in the United States.

PARCEL POST.

The parcel post was established January 1, 1913. It has been greatly extended by the Post Office Department and by legislation since that time. At present it is coming into close competition with the express companies, and has been the cause of lowering express rates throughout the United States. On this account it is of great value to the people generally. The rates from time to time have been very much reduced and the size and weight of packages have been increased. Almost everything can now be sent in this way. The man on the farm can have his customers at the various markets, and through the parcel post can supply them with poultry and dairy products, meats, vegetables, fruits, and, in fact, everything grown upon the farm. When the people generally become familiar with how to use this service to advantage, and when they learn that practically everything can be sent by means of the parcel post, as well as how to pack their products so that they can be sent in this manner at an extremely low cost, this service will be very much more used and in time supplant the express companies altogether.

POSTAL SAVINGS.

By the act of June 25, 1910, Congress established postal savings depositories and authorized various postmasters to accept postal savings to the amount of $100 from each depositor for any one calendar month until the aggregate amount reached $500. Congress recently during this session amended this act by increasing the amount any depositor may make to $2,000, of which not to exceed $1,000 may be interest bearing.

The records show that most of these deposits are made by foreign-born wage earners, who are either suspicious of or not familiar with the methods of banking in the United States. There is now deposited under the present Postal Savings System about $73,000,000, to the credit of 560,000 depositors. Under the previous law, when the limit of any account was $500, it is interesting to note that there were 30,000 of such accounts, and 22,000 of these depositors were foreign born.

It is believed that since the passage of the act authorizing a deposit of $2,000, of which one-half may be interest bearing, much money will be brought out of hiding, and without any additional expense to the Government the aggregate amount placed on deposit will be greatly increased. Any system which encourages thrift and saving and at the same time brings money out of hiding and places it in circulation is of great value to the development of the country.

On June 30, 1915, $324,189.03 was deposited to the credit of postal savings depositors in Oklahoma.

DROP LETTERS.

I have introduced a bill to provide for 1-cent postage on drop letters for two reasons:

First. The records show that a local-delivery letter does not cost the Government for handling it more than one-fourth of 1 cent, and a charge of 2 cents upon such a letter, in my opinion, is not justifiable.

Second. I believe the people along rural routes and in cities and the managers of factories and large mercantile establishments would use the mails more extensively if the rate were lowered. The revenue of the department would not be greatly diminished as a result of this legislation.

Congratulations are due the great army of postal employees for the splendid service they are rendering the people of the country. [Applause.]

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Chairman, I ask leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MOON. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. PARK].

Mr. PARK. Mr. Chairman, I send the following amendment to the Clerk's desk to be read.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia offers an amendment, which will be numbered 10. The Clerk will report the amendment. Where does the gentleman want this amendment to go, at the end of the paragraph?

Mr. PARK. At the end of the paragraph.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of paragraph, page 2, line 6, insert the following: "That no rural route to be served by automobile of 50 miles or longer shall be authorized and established until it clearly shall appear that the service can be in effect for 12 months in the year on a regular schedule every day in the year."

Mr. PARK. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment in the interest of regularity and efficiency of the service, and unless the service shall be regular, unless the farmer knows that he is to get his mail, unless he knows when to go to meet the carrier with his package that is to go by parcel post or meet the carrier daily at a given time, it is of very little service to him.

The proof to be submitted by which an auto route shall be established should come from those most nearly affected by the change proposed; the people on the route, the carrier, the inspector, the postmaster, and the officials in charge of construction and repair and maintenance of roads should be heard from, and from all these sources the facts should be ascertained.

Regularity of service makes for efficiency; without it efficiency is destroyed. If a carrier must maintain an automobile when the roads are good for the service and two horses and buggies to serve the route when the roads are bad, there is no way to determine with certainty a carrier's pay, and no way to determine, except by weather conditions, when the route will be served by automobile or by horse and buggy.

No people are more worthy of the confidence and support of this Government than the faithful carriers, who travel the roads in storm and rain, in foul and fair weather, and before so radical a change shall be made by the Post Office Department every precaution should be taken to see that the service is not impaired.

The people in the rural districts derive more benefit from the Rural Free Delivery Service than from most all the benefits conferred upon them by the National Government, and we should be careful how we tamper with this great service to the rural population of our country.

If any changes shall be made, I favor only changes that will increase efficiency of service and in no way impair it.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa, Mr. PARK, Mr. WOODS of Iowa, Mr. BENNET, Mr. SLOAN, Mr. KINKAID, and Mr. MILLER of Pennsylvania by unanimous consent obtained leave to extend their remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all gentlemen who have spoken may be permitted to extend their remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. MANN. The universal ruling has been that the Committee of the Whole can not grant that authority; it can only be obtained in the House.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the request.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee withdraws his request for unanimous consent.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, I make the same request.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. Chairman, I make the same request.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. EDWARDS].

Mr. EDWARDS. Mr. Chairman, I want to speak briefly in support of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Florida

[Mr. CLARK]. It is clear to my mind that the change of routes ought not to be left entirely with the Post Office Department. I think the amendment offered by the gentleman from Florida will correct an evil of which a great number of us are complaining. Radical changes in the Rural Free Delivery Service have without doubt caused considerable trouble throughout the country. If it were left to a majority of the patrons on the routes affected to say whether or not they wanted routes converted into a motor-vehicle route or a change made, it would give a great deal better satisfaction to the people than to arbitrarily make the changes as is now done by the department. I hope the amendment offered by the gentleman from Florida will be held in order. I think it is clearly a limitation on this appropriation and is in order, and I hope it will prevail, because we need some legislation that will let the Post Office Department know how Congress feels about this matter. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] has four minutes left.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, my colleague from Tennessee [Mr. AUSTIN] wants to abuse the Democratic Party and the administration a little, and I give him three minutes for that purpose. [Laughter.]

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, I am afraid I can not do the subject justice in three minutes. I want to offer the following amendment, and I hope that no Member will lodge a point of order against it:

At the end of line 6, page 27, insert the following:
"That no rural free delivery route shall be discontinued or changed without the written approval of the Member of Congress who represents the district in which the route or routes are located."

[Applause.]

This is power and authority which ought to be given to the direct representatives of the people. They are supposed to know more about the requirements of the Rural Free Delivery Service, the improvements that can be made by changing or discontinuing routes in their respective districts, than the bureau officials located in Washington, perhaps several hundred or thousand miles away.

Now, in my district we have suffered from the attempt to economize, and I want to say to the present administration, although I doubt whether I have very much influence with it, but it is advice which I would submit to my own party, namely, that the last place to begin making a record for economy is at the expense of an efficient Postal Service. [Applause.] There are many other ways of saving money to the Government without taking from the people what they have enjoyed for years, namely, a daily mail service. If our Democratic friends want to raise a sufficient amount of money to continue the efficient and satisfactory Postal Service which they inherited from the Republican administration, let them increase the tariff and raise this revenue from the flood of foreign-made goods coming in now on the free list. [Applause on the Republican side.]

A route was changed in my district recently, and the carrier was unable for a week to deliver the mail on account of a flood in a creek or river; yet a man in good faith, in the department here, looking over a blue-print map, reached the conclusion that he could do it. It was all a theory, like most other things that emanate from this administration; it was not practical. [Applause on the Republican side.] There has never been a criticism of a Republican or Democratic administration, and the charge of "pork barrel" has never been lodged, against an extension and improvement of the Postal Service, which reaches every home in this country; and this administration has not done a more unpopular thing and one that will injure it more at the polls in November, and the Lord knows they are going to be injured enough on that occasion, than to curtail and cripple the Postal Service in this country.

Now, I want to say in closing my little speech that we have one of the best and most efficient men at the head of this committee, Judge MOON. I usually follow him. He has done more to improve the Postal Service and give us needed legislation for the various postal officials than the chairman of any committee in my knowledge in half a century. I can not follow him in everything. I can not follow him on the railway pay proposition, because I think the railroad corporations in this country should have just as fair a deal as a private corporation or an individual, and when there is a serious dispute it should be submitted to the Interstate Commerce Commission to adjust and settle. But upon other propositions, where there are no politics involved, I am willing to follow my colleague, who represents the district next to mine, which I think perhaps has a good influence upon him. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. AUSTIN] has expired. Has the gentleman an amendment?

Mr. AUSTIN. Yes; I have.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of line 6, on page 27, insert the following:
"That no rural free-delivery route shall be discontinued or changed without the written approval of the Member of Congress who represents the district in which the route or routes are located."

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order on that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee has one minute left.

Mr. MOON. I yield that to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, what became of the point of order on the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. AUSTIN]?

Mr. AUSTIN. My colleague made it, but I hope to persuade him to withdraw it later on.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. A parliamentary inquiry. Are the rulings on the points of order to be held until the close of the discussion?

Mr. MADDEN. Discussion has closed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] has one minute.

Mr. MOON. The Chair can rule on the points of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] has expired. All time has expired.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be heard on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is not going to pass upon all these points of order at the present time. As to amendment A, offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER]; amendment No. 3, offered by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CANDLER]; amendment No. 8, offered by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL]; amendment No. 9, offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEARNS]; amendment No. 10, offered by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. PARK]; and amendment No. 11, offered by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. AUSTIN]—the Chair sustains points of order as to all of these amendments.

The gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK] offered amendments which are numbered 1 and 2, and upon those amendments the Chair will hear from the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] and from any other gentleman who wants to discuss them.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, may we have those amendments again reported?

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report amendment numbered 1, offered by the gentleman from Florida.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment numbered 1, offered by Mr. CLARK of Florida:
"Page 27, line 6, after the word 'stations,' insert the words 'And provided further, That no part of the money herein appropriated for Rural Delivery Service shall be used to cover any expense on any motor vehicle route until a majority of the patrons to be served by such motor vehicle route shall by written petition ask the Post Office Department to establish such motor vehicle route.'"

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I think that that amendment clearly changes the law, and therefore is obnoxious to the rule.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to call the attention of the Chair to certain precedents that are directly in point, and clearly show that this amendment is in order.

There is a great body of decisions on the question of whether amendments are in order as limitations, or out of order as being legislation. Many of these decisions seem to be impossible of reconciliation, so shadowy is the dividing line in many instances between limitation, and legislation. In other words a real twilight zone exists in this field. But I desire to call the attention of the Chair to a precedent found on page 640 of Hinds' Precedents. The Post Office appropriation bill being then under consideration, the committee had reached the section providing for railway-postal service, $5,700,000. To this provision Mr. Tawney submitted the following amendment:

Provided, That no part of the amount now hereby appropriated shall be expended for the use of cars in the railway-postal service that have been used in said service for a period of more than 15 years.

A point of order was directed against this amendment on the ground that it was legislation. This point was raised by the chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads. Without undertaking to read all that is stated in the ruling, I desire to call the attention of the Chair to the fact that the point of order was overruled.

Permit me to call your attention to a precedent found on page 679, section 3998, in which a proviso was offered to the effect that money for a bridge should not be available until the corporation using it should fulfill certain conditions. Without the proviso it was perfectly clear that the bridge would be repaired out of the sum appropriated without condition, or limitation on the expenditure.

The effect of the proviso, treated as a limitation, was to require certain things to be done by a railway corporation before the appropriation would be available. This was in effect a change of law secured however by a limitation upon the application of the appropriation. Permit me to call your attention to another precedent on the same page.

The CHAIRMAN. Page 679?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Yes; page 679, section 3999, "A proposition that no part of an appropriation should be paid until the passing of a title," was held to be a limitation. The point of order to this amendment was made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON]. The amendment was this:

That no part of this appropriation shall be available or be paid to said bank until the title to the bank shall be completed and the title to the old customhouse property passed under the laws of New York to the said bank.

Mr. CANNON made the point of order that that amendment was legislation, but the Chair overruled the point.

Let me call your attention to one further precedent that is so precisely in point that I do not see how the most subtle consideration can possibly differentiate it from the proposition now before the committee. This precedent is on page 681, and is found in section 4002. To a provision for the payment of the expenses of certain judges, a provision that no part of the money should be expended, except on an itemized statement, was held in order. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. MACON] offered the following amendment:

Provided, That no part of said sum herein appropriated shall be used for the payment of the expenses of said district judges, unless said certificates contained an itemized statement of said expenses.

It is perfectly clear that without this proviso the judges were not required to set out any items in their certificates of expenses. In other words, the Government was empowered to pay these expenses on a simple certificate of the amount. But under the terms of the proviso, the Government could not pay a single one of the judges contemplated in the appropriation, unless this judge filed a statement which contained an itemized account of his expenses. The usual point of order was made that the proviso was legislation, and not a limitation. But the point of order was overruled.

Under existing law the department is authorized to convert a horse-drawn route into a motor-vehicle route, without any limitation on its authority, but under the amendment this action can not be taken until there is filed in the department a petition signed by a majority of the patrons on the route requesting the change. This is a clear limitation on the authority of the department. It is a condition which must be complied with, before the authority of the department can be set in motion.

It seems to me that it is perfectly clear under these precedents, without regard to a great body of additional precedents that might be cited, that this amendment is a limitation, and therefore is in order.

Further I would like to call the attention of the Chair to one or two other precedents that are not in Hinds' Precedents, but were made recently and are available. One of them was made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] presiding over the Committee of the Whole during the consideration of the Indian bill. The other was made a year before that by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS], presiding over the same committee during the consideration of the same bill. Doubtless the decisions are available at the desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is familiar with the decisions.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I desire to call the attention of the Chair to the fact that by the amendments affected by those rulings the money appropriated could not be availed of until a tribunal referred to in said amendments, had passed on certain propositions. Certainly these amendments were more nearly legislation than what is proposed by the amendment under consideration.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I do not care to discuss the question at length, but it appears to me that the proposed limitation is in the nature rather of a subterfuge than a legitimate limitation. The law provides for 50-mile routes. He proposes to change the law, not by the enactment of law in new terms but by an alleged limitation that carries with it the consent of the people along the route to the change of the route before the Postmaster General can perform his function of disbursing this fund under the law. It seems to me that if the position of the gentleman is correct, then there is but little reason in the proposition that there shall be no new legislation upon appropriation bills.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, concerning this amendment and other amendments that provide limitations on expenditures I desire to make a few suggestions to the Chair. They apply not only to this amendment but to others of that character.

Of course the Chair understands, as do all gentlemen familiar with our parliamentary law, that we are now interpreting Rule XXI, and it is the duty of the Chair to determine whether or not these cases present such a limitation on appropriations, or, rather, the statement of conditions upon which the appropriations shall be used, as really to bring them within the exceptions that are provided for under the terms of that rule. It will not be a sufficient objection, Mr. Chairman, to say that they constitute new legislation, because in a sense every provision upon an appropriation bill constitutes new legislation. The only question for the Chair to decide is as to whether or not it really constitutes such a limitation upon the appropriations as ought to be considered and passed upon by the Committee of the Whole House, which is now considering this bill.

I desire to call the particular attention of the Chair to Hinds' Precedents, volume 4, page 621, section 3926. In this case the Post Office appropriation bill was under consideration, and the Clerk read the following provision of the bill:

For compensation to 25 rural agents, at $1,600 each; 15 rural agents, at $1,500 each; 15 rural agents, at $1,400 each; 19 rural agents, at $1,300 each; 65 rural agents, at $1,200 each; and 10 rural agents, at $1,000 each, $196,200.

To this Mr. William W. Kitchin, of North Carolina, offered the following as an amendment:

Insert, in line 18, page 24, after the word "dollars," "Provided"—

And to this language I ask the Chairman's careful attention—

"Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be paid to any rural agent who after the 1st day of July, 1904, shall make a recommendation against the establishment of any route on account of the condition of the road over which said route extends or is proposed to extend."

After debate, the Chair held that that was a limitation and in order. Certainly if that could be held as a limitation, the amendment offered by the gentleman from Florida must certainly be within the rule.

I want now to call the attention of the Chair to a decision found on page 636, of volume 4 of Hinds' Precedents, section 3942. In that case the Agricultural appropriation bill was under consideration in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and the Clerk had read the paragraph relating to agricultural colleges, when Mr. Charles B. Landis, of Indiana, proposed this amendment:

Provided, That no part of the appropriation shall be available for the Agricultural College of Utah until the Secretary of Agriculture shall be satisfied, and shall so certify to the Secretary of the Treasury, that no trustee, officer, instructor, or employee of said college is engaged in the practice of polygamy or polygamous relations.

Some debate having taken place, and Mr. William H. King, of Utah, having suggested a point of order, the Chairman said:

There are two reasons why the Chair would be inclined to overrule the point. In the first place, it comes rather late, and in the second place, the amendment seems to be a limitation upon this appropriation.

The amendment having been agreed to, Mr. King offered the following amendment:

And that no person shall be appointed a teacher or trustee of said college who has been engaged in any lynching and until proof shall have been furnished, to the satisfaction of the Secretary of Agriculture, that such teacher or trustee has not been guilty of adultery or fornication.

Mr. Charles H. Grosvenor, of Ohio, made the point of order that the amendment was not in order.

The Chairman said:

Let the Chair state to the gentleman that the ruling on the other amendment was that that was a limitation upon the appropriation—providing that no part of this appropriation shall be paid to the agricultural college, in general terms, until it was ascertained that no teacher or trustee was a polygamist. That is a general statement of that amendment. That was a limitation upon the appropriation. Then comes this independent proposition, involving legislation. * * * The Chair sustains the point of order.

Thereupon Mr. King offered the following, and to this I call the particular attention of the Chair:

Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be available for the agricultural college of Indiana or any other State or Territory until the Secretary of Agriculture shall be satisfied, and shall so certify to the Secretary of the Treasury, that no trustee, officer, instructor, or employee of said college is engaged in the practice of polygamy or polygamous relations or is guilty of adultery or fornication.

In other words, Mr. Chairman, the form of the amendment was changed until it became a limitation upon the appropriation by its express terms.

To this amendment Mr. Grosvenor made the point of order.

The Chairman overruled the point of order and held that the amendment was in order.

Now, Mr. Chairman, there might be many cases cited along this line. I am only calling attention to these for the purpose of showing to the Chair that these cases which I have cited are much stronger upon the objectionable features that the chairman of the committee calls attention to than the present one. It can be said, as I have said before, that any of these propositions in a sense is new legislation. It can not be said in this case that they are repealing legislation, because there is no legislation in existence regarding these things. There has never been any. Most of the rural-route regulation rests entirely upon departmental order. We are not repealing existing law. Neither are we in these cases making law. The proposed amendments are not to be considered as affecting anything except this particular appropriation for this particular year; and I submit that under the precedents, when it is so limited, when it does not change existing law, when it is not making a permanent law for the government of future Congresses, when it is only intended as a limitation on the manner in which the money shall be used, which we are now appropriating for the ensuing year, it certainly is within the rule, and it is proper for Congress to have that power.

Congress ought to have the right to say how this money shall be used, and if the proposed amendment is not contradictory to existing law, if it is only a limitation on the appropriation, the authorities are ample and universal to the proposition that it is proper, and the point of order will not lie against it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. The law on this subject is found in the proviso to the act of March 4, 1915, fixing the pay of rural carriers, page 1227, Statutes at Large, volume 38, and reads as follows:

Provided, That in the discretion of the Postmaster General the pay of carriers who furnish and maintain their own motor vehicles, and who serve routes not less than 50 miles in length, may be fixed at not exceeding $1,800 per annum.

The law does not limit motor-vehicle routes to 50 miles in length; does not require that these routes shall be at least 50 miles in length; but authorizes the Postmaster General to fix the compensation of carriers who operate motor vehicles on routes at least 50 miles in length at a sum not exceeding $1,800 per annum.

The amendment—No. 1—which we are considering, offered by the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK], provides that no part of the money appropriated for rural-delivery service shall be available to cover any expense upon any motor-vehicle route unless a majority of the patrons to be served on that route have requested by written petition the Post Office Department to establish such motor-vehicle route.

Examining the precedents, the Chair finds that on January 11, 1905, while the Army appropriation bill was under consideration in Committee of the Whole, an amendment was proposed to the enacting paragraph—

That the following sums be, and they are hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the support of the Army for the year ending June 30, 1906—

To this effect: That no part of the moneys appropriated in the act should be expended for the support and maintenance of more than 30,000 men, including officers and enlisted men. That amendment was offered by Mr. John S. Little, of Arkansas. A point of order was made to this amendment, and, after the matter was debated, the Chairman held that the amendment appeared to be drawn in conformity with a large number of precedents in the form of limitations.

"The amendment," the Chairman held, "discloses the fact that it does not in terms cut down the number of officers or enlisted men in the Army, but limits the appropriation in the bill to a certain number of officers and enlisted men, to wit, to 30,000," and the Chair held that the amendment seemed to be in strict conformity with a number of other amendments to which points of order had been overruled, and that this merely placed a limitation on the use of money appropriated in that act, and overruled the point of order.

The Chair has listened to the reading of these numerous other authorities to which attention has been called, and it seems to the Chair that the authorities are in perfect harmony on this question. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK] is a limitation. It prevents the expenditure of the moneys appropriated for Rural Delivery Service upon motor-vehicle routes which have not been established in compliance with a petition signed by a majority of the patrons of the route. The Chair thinks the amendment is in order, and overrules the point of order.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I now ask unanimous consent to withdraw the second amendment which I offered.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK] asks unanimous consent to withdraw amendment No. 2. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I think it would be most unfortunate if this House should adopt the amendment offered by the gentleman from Florida——

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I submit that debate is exhausted on this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that debate is exhausted under a previous agreement.

Mr. MADDEN. Very well.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that amendment No. 1 be again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment.

There was no objection, and the Clerk again reported amendment No. 1.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Florida.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MOON) there were—ayes 131, noes 33.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MOON. I understand that the amendment provides that no part of this appropriation shall be used until the demand of the amendment is complied with?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair so understands the amendment.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry as to whether or not the motor routes already established come under this amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment will speak for itself. The Chair does not care to construe the legal effect of this amendment. Without objection, the Clerk will again report amendment No. 4, offered by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CANDLER].

There was no objection, and the Clerk again reported amendment No. 4, offered by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CANDLER].

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Mississippi on the point of order.

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I contend that this amendment is in order, because it is clearly a limitation on the appropriation made in the bill. The provision in the bill is an appropriation of $53,000,000 for the Rural Delivery Service.

This amendment provides that the money shall not be expended until the salaries of the rural carriers are paid out of the money heretofore appropriated in accordance with the joint resolution fixing the amount of the salaries which those carriers were to receive, and hence the amount that they were to receive is fixed and definite and the money out of which these payments are to be made has already been appropriated and the limitation is to the effect that this appropriation shall not be expended until after the money heretofore appropriated is paid out in accordance with the provisions in the statute heretofore enacted. Now, then, it seems to me that one of the precedents referred to a moment ago by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS] is directly in point. That provision is—

That no part of such sum herein appropriated shall be used for the payment of expenses of such district judges unless said certificates contain an itemized statement of said expenses.

That is found on page 681 of Hinds' Precedents. I call attention to another, on page 678, paragraph 3997. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] offered an amendment as follows:

Provided, That no part of the money herein appropriated for dredging, improving, and building retaining walls in and about the reserve basin shall be expended until there has been prepared ready for submission to Congress at its next session an estimate of the completed cost of such reserve basin.

And on page 680, section 4000:

Provided, That none of the above amounts appropriated for the naval station at Fort Royal shall be available or used until the United States shall have acquired all right and title to the land claimed by Agnes A. Niver adjacent to the land where the dry dock now is, and involved in litigation in the United States Court of Claims—

And so forth.

That was put upon a future contingency and as a limitation upon the appropriation. This amendment makes the limitation contingent upon the payment of the money and the adjustment of the salaries previously authorized to be paid for which an appropriation has already been made and says that this money shall not be expended for this service until these salaries are adjusted and paid in accordance with the specific act of Congress.

The CHAIRMAN. Let the Chair call the attention of the gentleman from Mississippi to his amendment. His amendment recites that the amounts provided for in this paragraph shall not be expended until there shall have been paid to letter carriers, their executors or administrators, out of the appropriation for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915, last year, enough money to make up a certain amount that they did not receive. That amounts to a reappropriation of an unexpended balance for the year ending June 30, 1915, the last fiscal year.

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. No, sir; it provides that this shall be paid out of money already appropriated. The money is already appropriated under a provision of an act of Congress and is now available and can be paid out to-morrow.

The CHAIRMAN. But that money is now back in the Treasury again.

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. No, sir; it does not go back to the Treasury until three years after the appropriation. It is now in the Post Office Department and is available, and the report of the Auditor for the Post Office Department shows the specific amount is now in the Post Office Department already appropriated and now available, and it can not go back and will not go back until three years after the appropriation was made.

The CHAIRMAN. In any event the gentleman's amendment, in fact, provides for an appropriation of an unexpended balance in addition to the amount carried in this clause, does it not?

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. No, sir; it simply provides that the unexpended balance already appropriated and now available be paid out before this other money shall be used.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I would suggest there is no possible connection between the two appropriations. If the gentleman's position is correct, you could not spend a dollar under this bill until you had gone back and settled up with these carriers.

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. That is true; and that is the reason it is a limitation, and therefore in order.

Mr. MOON. It is not a limitation at all. If that sort of a holding could be made, there would be no use in having a rule on the subject. It is utter nonsense, in my opinion.

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. It may be nonsense to the distinguished gentleman from Tennessee, but it is good, honest, common sense to us who believe these letter carriers should be paid what is justly due them.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Iowa want to be heard?

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I desire only to call attention to the impression that I think exists with regard to the reappropriation proposition. The adoption of this amendment would not mean a reappropriation of the amounts affected. It should be remembered that this money was appropriated for the particular purpose of paying the carriers. It should be remembered that it was not used. It should be remembered that it is now in the Treasury for that purpose. It should be remembered that it is subject to the order of the Postmaster General whenever he shall decide that it shall be paid out in accordance with the law. He has so far said only part of this money shall be paid, not all of it. Now, the gentleman's proviso is simply this, not that a new sum shall be appropriated, Mr. Chairman, not that a new amount shall be made payable subject to his order, but only that he shall do that which, in fact, he has already been directed to do—to order it to be paid out to the men who are entitled to it under the law. That is all. The money is now in the Treasury; it is now available; it is not a new appropriation. It is only asking that this appropriation for this year shall not be available until the order has been issued by the department carrying out the provisions of a law already made.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say just a few words on the point of order that has been made. While I should like to see such a provision enacted as this amendment proposes, it seems to me clearly that the amendment proposed is not a limitation on this appropriation but is a requirement that something be done with an appropriation that has already been made and is, in fact and effect, entirely new legislation. While it is contended by the gentleman introducing the amendment that it is a limitation upon the appropriation that is made in this bill, it has no direct reference to how this appropriation or any part of it may be expended. On the other hand, it provides how a part of an appropriation made by a preceding Congress shall be expended. It seems to me that the point of order made is clearly well taken and should be sustained.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, just a word on the point of order. I think the point of order is well taken. There is no connection whatever between the proposed appropriation in the pending bill and the appropriation in the preceding bill. The preceding appropriation was for the current fiscal year 1916. This is an appropriation for the fiscal year 1917. Now, in the distribution or the paying out of the appropriation made for the fiscal year 1916 the Postmaster General paid that out under the law which gave to him the discretionary power to fix salaries and the amount of payment made to each rural route carrier in the United States.

I do not remember just exactly when that law was passed, but it was some 12 or 15 years ago. Now, you can not go back, in my judgment, by this limitation and bring forward an appropriation that was made for a year past. If any funds remain undisposed of at the end of two years they are covered into the Treasury of the United States, and the gentleman's amendment or proposed limitation is a violation of that section of the statute which plainly declares that all unexpended balances at the end of two years must be covered into the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COX. For a question.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. When the gentleman first started he said he did not believe the point of order was well taken. He did not mean to say that, did he?

Mr. COX. I think it is well taken.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks this may make it necessary for the Postmaster General to expend certain sums that might not otherwise be expended, under this clause "unexpended and still available." The Chair thinks the point of order should be sustained, and sustains the point of order to amendment No. 4, offered by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CANDLER]. The Clerk will report amendment No. 5, offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD].

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 27, at the end of line 6, change period to colon, and add: "Provided, further, That no part of the sum hereby appropriated shall be used to pay the salary of any rural carrier using a horse-drawn vehicle to carry the mail over any route the major portion of which is over dirt roads, if the total length of such route exceeds 26 miles."

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GOOD. I understand the amendment of the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK] was adopted, and that amendment is interposed at the same point where I have introduced this amendment. That being the case, my amendment ought to be modified so as to follow the amendment offered by the gentleman from Florida.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will insert before the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa the words "And provided further," without objection. Is there objection to so modifying the amendment? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Chair will hear from the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] on the point of order.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I can not conceive how this amendment is subject to a point of order. In specific terms it provides that no part of the money hereby appropriated shall be used to pay the salary of any rural carrier carrying mail over a rural route the major portion of which is over dirt roads if that route is more than 26 miles in length. The law does not specify the length of any rural route. There is no law on that subject. There is no legislation upon it. This amendment is intended simply to provide that the Postmaster General can not pay out a dollar of this fund to a rural-route carrier——

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GOOD. When I finish the statement. If the rural route established is over dirt roads, or where a major portion of it is over a dirt road, if that route is more than 26 miles in length. It is clearly a limitation that can not be construed in any sense as legislation.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GOOD. Certainly.

Mr. COX. Is the gentleman able to point to any law relating to any establishment of rural routes, from the time they were first organized down to the present time, declaring anything about the kind of a road over which the route should be carried?

Mr. GOOD. No.

Mr. COX. Then is this not clearly a change in existing law?

Mr. GOOD. Then the gentleman would hold, according to that reasoning, that the amendment that the Chair just held in order, offered by the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK], was out of order and the point of order should be sustained?

Mr. COX. I think there is a clear distinction between the gentleman's amendment and the amendment offered by the gentleman from Florida. I think the gentleman's amendment brings in another element here which does change existing law, because it seems to bring in and designate a particular kind of road over which mail is to be carried, while there is no law up to this time which designates the kind of a road.

Mr. GOOD. My amendment does nothing of the kind. The amendment simply provides that if the mail is carried over a route the major portion of which is of dirt roads, then nothing shall be paid for rural carrier service over that route if the length of the route is more than 26 miles.

Mr. STEENERSON. Now, under existing law the department has established a standard route of 24 miles?

Mr. GOOD. Yes.

Mr. STEENERSON. And they have established in my district, for instance, more than half the routes——

Mr. GOOD. There are some in my district of 32 miles.

Mr. STEENERSON. And they have been running for years. Now, if you adopt this amendment it would deprive the people of my district on over half of the routes of any service whatever.

Mr. GOOD. Where is there any law establishing these routes?

Mr. STEENERSON. The executive department has established routes of 26 or 28 or 30 miles. Most of them in my district are more than 26 miles. By this so-called limitation are you going to deprive those people of any service whatever?

Mr. GOOD. Unquestionably if this is adopted it will change department law, but it will not change the statutes of the United States in a single particular.

Mr. FINLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Iowa yield to the gentleman from South Carolina?

Mr. GOOD. Yes.

Mr. FINLEY. Is the gentleman aware that the longest routes in the country, generally speaking, are those west of the Mississippi River, and particularly in the State of Kansas and other States that are arid to some extent and have not the amount of rainfall we have east of the river, and a great many of those routes are 30 miles long, and some 32, some 33, and some 35 miles? Now, what would the gentleman do? Would he deprive those people of Rural Delivery Service?

Mr. GOOD. No.

Mr. FINLEY. At present they are served by horse-drawn vehicles, and the gentleman's amendment would cut out each and every route in all that section—routes more than 26 miles in length.

Mr. GOOD. I will answer the gentleman's question. If I had my way about it, I would draw a provision which would be more workable than this. I would draw a provision that would permit the Postmaster General in such cases to extend that rural service. But if I write in this amendment, giving authority to establish rural routes of more than 26 miles where the major portion of the route is over dirt roads, say, 30 miles, then I will do just what the department is doing, and thereby destroy the rural service. I think the gentleman has seen today, by the evidence displayed in this House, that the department shall not be allowed to make a law in regard to the rural service in violation of the express wish of Congress.

Mr. FINLEY. I have seen all that, and I appreciate it fully. Now, I will say this to the gentleman, that if his amendment prevails nine-tenths of all the rural routes of the United States that exceed 26 miles in length will be deprived of rural service.

Mr. GOOD. The gentleman knows that that is a small part of the service. If the gentleman will read his own committee's hearings, he will find that on these long routes the major portion of them is not over dirt roads.

Mr. FINLEY. In Kansas——

Mr. GOOD. In the eastern part of Kansas, to which the gentleman refers, I know something about, and in the eastern part of Nebraska they are having the same trouble that we are having elsewhere; but I am not talking about the semiarid country.

Mr. FINLEY. I have in mind the rural routes in my own district.

Mr. GOOD. The gentleman is talking about Kansas. In the eastern part of Kansas, where the rainfall is the same as in the eastern part of Nebraska and the western part of Missouri and Iowa, it is impossible to have these long routes and at the same time give the people any sort of effective service.

Mr. FINLEY. I will say again, if the gentleman's amendment is carried here, it will militate against those people who are served by rural routes now more than 26 miles long, and it should be voted down.

Mr. GOOD. The gentleman is making an argument on the merits of the proposition. I understood the chairman wanted to hear argument upon the question as to whether or not this was a limitation.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I want to make just one suggestion. I undertake to say that it can not be found anywhere in the organic act establishing rural routes where the law undertakes to define the kind and character of the road over which the route should pass.

Now, the Chair judicially knows that in this country there are all kinds of roads, some dirt roads, some rock roads, and some gravel roads. There being no law requiring a certain standard road over which the route must pass before it can be established, my point is, if I can make myself plain, that the gentleman's amendment seeks to make a particular kind and character of road, to wit, that of a dirt road, and bring it in here as a law, and make it a part of this appropriation bill, which is in violation of the rules of this House. You can not incorporate general legislation upon an appropriation bill except under certain conditions, which, of course, the gentleman's amendment does not come under.

To make myself a little plainer, it is a violation of the rules of this House, because it seeks to place upon this appropriation bill general legislation—that of establishing the kind and character of the road over which the route must pass before the salaries carried under this appropriation can be paid. It is clearly subject to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the amendment is not subject to a point of order. It does not limit the route to 26 miles, but it limits the expenditures provided for in this paragraph to roads the major portion of which are over dirt roads and which are 26 miles or under, and makes permissible expenditures on routes that are over 26 miles. The Chair thinks that the point of order should be overruled. The question is on agreeing to amendment No. 5, offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD].

Mr. RICKETTS. Mr. Chairman, may we have the amendment again reported?

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 27, at the end of line 6, change the period to a colon and add: "And provided further, That no part of the sum hereby appropriated shall be used to pay the salary of any rural carrier using a horse-drawn vehicle to carry the mail over any route the major portion of which is over dirt roads if the total length of such route exceeds 26 miles."

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have unanimous consent to debate this amendment for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent for five minutes in which to discuss the amendment on the merits. Is there objection?

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I understand the gentleman is against this amendment, and if he is to discuss it I want a similar length of time.

Mr. FOSTER. I object, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is heard. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the amendment be again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment has just been reported, but if there is no objection the amendment will be again reported.

There was no objection.

The amendment was again read.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD].

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the "noes" seemed to have it.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a division.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] asks for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 25, noes 79.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will report amendment No. 6, offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL].

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 27, line 6, after the word "stations," insert:

"Provided, That in the payment of sums for this appropriation as salary to rural-route carriers the money so paid when any rural route is reestablished shall, on the filing of an application by the person who was the carrier at the time the rural route was abandoned, requesting that he be reappointed, go to said carrier, unless there was just cause for his removal from the service at the time the rural route was abandoned or just cause has since arisen."

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, this amendment is simply intended to put the former carriers back on their jobs which they lost when these routes were motorized.

Against my protest last fall this department motorized one route in my county of Muscatine. They thereby took two men who were under the civil service and put them out of a job. I asked for an inspection, and the department inspected the route——

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, is this on the point of order or on the merits?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair wishes to hear the gentleman on the point of order. The Chair does not care to hear a discussion of the merits.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Well, deferring to the Chairman, it seems to me that the ruling of the Chair on a previous amendment here to-day makes this in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks this amendment is not in order. The Chair does not think this is a limitation. The point of order is sustained to amendment No. 6, offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL]. The Clerk will report amendment No. 7, offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HULL of Iowa: Page 27, line 6, after the word "stations," insert:

"Provided, That such sums as may be necessary may be used from the money hereby appropriated to restore the rural routes to the efficiency they had attained prior to March 4, 1915, and it shall be mandatory on the Post Office Department to so restore said route when a majority of the patrons request in writing such restoration."

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Iowa desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I will submit it without debate.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained. This disposes of all amendments offered to this section. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

That if the revenues of the Post Office Department shall be insufficient to meet the appropriations made by this act, a sum equal to such deficiency of the revenue of said department is hereby appropriated, to be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to supply said deficiencies in the revenues for the Post Office Department for the year ending June 30, 1917, and the sum needed may be advanced to the Post Office Department upon requisition of the Postmaster General.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Beginning with line 12, on page 27, add a new paragraph, as follows:

"That section 6 of the act of August 24, 1912 (ch. 389, 37 Stat., p. 555), be amended to read as follows:

"'No postal employee in the classified service of the United States shall be removed or reduced in rank and compensation except for such cause as will promote the efficiency of the service and for reasons given in writing, and the person whose removal or reduction is sought shall have notice of the same and of any charges preferred against him, and be furnished with a copy, including evidence, and also be allowed a reasonable time for personally answering the same in writing and to submit evidence or affidavits to the Civil Service Commission, with opportunity for an oral hearing, at which the employee may be represented by counsel, and witnesses shall be sworn and the testimony recorded; and the Civil Service Commission shall have the power to issue and enforce process to secure the attendance of witnesses, administer oaths, to require any Government official or employees to produce books or papers relating to the charges under investigation, to issue commissions to its district commissioners for the taking of testimony, which shall be taken in the county where the witness resides when the same can be conveniently done: Provided, That the Civil Service Commission may remand the case with such orders as may seem to it proper in the premises, and its judgment and decrees shall be final.'"

Mr. MOON. I make a point of order against that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from California desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. NOLAN. I will ask the gentleman from Tennessee to reserve his point of order. I should like to be heard on the merits.

Mr. MOON. In order that the gentleman may have five minutes, I will reserve the point of order for five minutes.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this amendment is to amplify the antigag law passed in the Sixty-second Congress. It is to give the postal employees of this country a fair trial and the right of appeal. It provides that they shall have the right to a copy of the charges, including the evidence, and also to be allowed a reasonable time for personally answering the same in writing, and to submit evidence or affidavits to the Civil Service Commission, which is the appellate tribunal, with opportunity for an oral hearing, at which the employee may be represented by counsel and witnesses be sworn and the testimony recorded.

Under the present system a departmental official can prefer charges against any postal employee in this country, and he has only the opportunity to see the written charges. He has no right to see the testimony introduced against him, and no right of appeal unless he can convince the Civil Service Commission that he is being discriminated against for religious or political reasons. This is an amendment in the interest of fair dealing to the employees. They want the right to see the evidence, and they ought to have the right to see the evidence that is introduced to substantiate the charges. They ought to have the right to an oral hearing. They ought to have the right to a court of appeals, and the proper court of appeals would be the Civil Service Commission, which would have the right to designate local civil-service representatives to hear these charges and give the individual a fair trial. Now, postal employee after postal employee has been dismissed, almost without a hearing, without opportunity to hear the testimony in support of the charges, and without the right of appeal from the decision of the department when he was denied a fair trial, and it is not in line with the spirit of the antigag law passed in the Sixty-second Congress. The purpose of this amendment is to give to the postal employees of the Government of the United States the same right that they would enjoy in a civil or criminal court in this country, provided they were charged with an offense against the law. It is about time that Congress should recognize the discrimination that has been practiced against civil-service employees, and that they be given a fair trial, and that the opportunity for prejudiced department officials to vent their spleen upon the postal employees or any other employees of the civil service whenever they see fit should be taken away. The amendment is offered in that spirit, and while it is probably subject to a point of order, it must be given consideration either in this appropriation bill or in a separate bill reported to this House.

The following letter from Thomas F. Flaherty, secretary-treasurer of the National Federation of Post Office Clerks, explains the need of the right of appeal and the right to a hearing for postal employees:

NATIONAL FEDERATION OF POST OFFICE CLERKS,
Washington, D. C., February 18, 1916.

Mr. JOHN I. NOLAN,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. NOLAN: I am addressing you upon a matter of vital importance to the postal employees of the country—the granting to them of the right of appeal and the right to a hearing upon charges affecting their salaries and positions—and I ask your support of the proposed amendment to the civil-service laws which will accomplish this result.

As you are aware, there is a bill now pending before the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service, H. R. 9921, introduced by Representative KEATING, of Colorado, which seeks to give all classified civil-service employees the right to appeal to the United States Board of Mediation and Conciliation, an unbiased, detached tribunal, in cases of demotion or dismissal. This is a meritorious measure, and I trust Congress will give it the consideration it deserves; but pending action on this bill, and as a matter of legislative expediency, I ask that you endeavor to amplify the legislation enacted by the Sixty-second Congress, August 24, 1912, known as the antigag law, which provided that the employee whose removal or demotion was sought must be notified in writing; but it further provided that no hearing was to be given except at the discretion of the officer making the removal or demotion.

Postal employees have found the present law inadequate, as it permits no appeal from the arbitrary judgment of the department official. He is complainant, judge, jury, prosecuting attorney, and high chief executioner. The hapless employee has only the doubtful privilege of seeing the written charges against him. Should he see fit to make reply, the department need give it no serious consideration. Its decision in the case is final; the employee has no appeal. It is this weakness in the law that operates to the disadvantage and frequently to the great injustice of efficient employees. This amendment merely strengthens the law by granting the employees the right of an oral hearing before the Civil Service Commission or its authorized representative, at which the employee may be represented by counsel and the testimony recorded.

At present the commission refuses to review or to assume jurisdiction to investigate a case unless it is alleged, with offer of proof, that the removal was made for political or religious reasons. In all other cases the employees must submit to the arbitrary judgment of their department heads.

It is not the purpose of this legislation to interfere with the proper administrative functions of the department. There should be no obstacles in the way of the removal of inefficient or undesirable employees. But the mere charge of inefficiency by the head of an office, when the real cause is prejudice, vindictiveness, or personal or political reasons, should at least be subject to review. An employee entering the service must prove his fitness in a competitive examination. His character and references are thoroughly investigated. He is not appointed permanently until he has proved his adaptability for the work during a six months' probationary period. Therefore, if there is such a severe test as to a man's ability to obtain the place, why should there not be some test as to his fitness to hold the position? The Civil Service Commission is very zealous in guarding the front door of the civil service, but heretofore the back door has been left wide open. The commission will not permit the political head of a department to select his subordinates, and yet it has heretofore taken the position that he could have practically free rein in getting rid of subordinates by use of the very elastic terms "inefficiency" and "insubordination."

Perhaps to the postal worker more than any other Government employee should this right to an appeal be given. A postal worker's job is everything to him. Men who have only a post-office training, only a knowledge of the details of post-office work, must sell their services to the only bidder—the Government. They can not start a rival business; they can not offer to work for a competitor. Unlike the craftsman or the stenographer or any other worker with expert knowledge, the postal expert can not capitalize his training. There is but one market for his wares—the post office. His job, his life, his all, should not be dependent upon the whim of a supervisory official, a biased inspector or an inefficient department head.

There is nothing revolutionary in this proposal to clothe the Federal Civil Service Commission with the power to review testimony and listen to oral arguments. Many State and municipal civil-service bodies now exercise a similar function. In New York City and in the State of Massachusetts some of the civil-service employees even have the right to a court review.

Postal employees' organizations are a unit in their desire to get some legislative relief to curb the tyrannical power now vested in the department heads. The various classes of employees, the clerks, the city and the rural carriers, and the railway mail clerks have adopted resolutions in their respective conventions asking for corrective legislation. Some prefer a trial board selected from the employees whenever disciplinary action is contemplated by the officials; personally I prefer the right to appeal to a tribunal, nonpolitical in its character, such as the United States Board of Mediation and Conciliation, but as a matter of legislative expediency I think this enlargement of the powers of the Civil Service Commission will bring the relief sought.

No department head should fear a review of his judgment if he is fair and just and desires to see justice done to his most lowly subordinate. As a matter of fact, he should welcome such a hearing, for then the charge can never be made by the dismissed employee that he was not accorded a fair hearing.

The unanimity of opinion among postal employees as to the need of legislation such as is here proposed indicates only too plainly that workers in the service have suffered from unjust, despotic actions of departmental officials. In my report to the San Francisco Convention of the National Federation of Post Office Clerks, September, 1915, I said on this subject:

"One of the most glaring defects in the Federal civil service is the inadequate protection afforded the employees against unjust dismissals. The theory of civil service, as I see it, is that it protects the public interest by taking the power to appoint employees from the political heads of the Government departments. Yet these political heads possess the absolute power to dismiss employees.

"Existing law provides that an employee whose dismissal is sought must be notified in writing, but it also provides that no hearing shall be given except in the discretion of the officer making the removal. The employee has no appeal from the arbitrary judgment of the department head, unless it is alleged, with offer of proof, that his removal was made for political or religious reasons. Thus we find the Postal Department acting as complainant, judge, jury, prosecuting attorney, and high chief executioner. The employee has the doubtful privilege of seeing the charges preferred against him. If he makes answer to them, the department is not even obliged to read this reply.

"If the civil-service employees are to have the right of a hearing and the right of appeal—rights which should be fundamental in this country—it is necessary that a detached tribunal, separate from the department concerned, be authorized to review charges, hear testimony, and investigate evidence the employee may have to submit.

"As stated, the Civil Service Commission now refuses to review cases of dismissals unless a religious or a political issue is raised. Either the commision's powers should be enlarged or a tribunal created to review cases and hear testimony. If a new tribunal be established, the employees should have representation upon it.

"The need of a court of appeals to which employees can turn for a review of the judgment of the official recommending dismissal is imperative. Both the service and the men require it. Many State, municipal, and foreign civil-service laws have been perfected to take the arbitrary power of dismissal from the transient political heads of departments, and the Federal Government can with profit follow this example by strengthening its civil-service laws in this respect.

"The right of an appeal from the judgment of a higher official is not merely a refuge for the inefficient; it is rather an effort to protect the efficient against inefficient administration. I concede that a Government official, charged with the responsibilities of conducting the affairs of his department economically and properly, should have sufficient leeway to rid the service of incompetents. But surely it is not unreasonable to ask an administrative official who seeks the dismissal of an employee for inefficiency, to submit his evidence of the unfitness of this employee to unbiased judges. This is simple justice in accord with our ideals of fair play.

"To the post-office clerk, more than any other civil-service employee, is this question of the right to a hearing and appeal of paramount importance. A clerk in fitting himself for post-office work unfits himself for occupation outside the post office. He must perforce depend absolutely upon the service for his livelihood. Unlike other artisans, a post-office clerk can not apply his knowledge generally; it is not of universal application; there is no competing postal service to which he can sell his skill and expertness. His position with the Government is everything to him and he should be fully protected in the right to hold it. He is entitled to have some appeal from the offhand judgment of his transient political superiors upon a matter of such consequence to him, the service, and the public.

"In view of the importance of this issue to the entire civil service of the Government, I urge this convention to take positive action, either by the appointment of a special committee to act with the legislative representative or by specific instructions to the executive committee, so that the next Congress may be advised of the necessity of protecting Federal civil-service employees against summary dismissals."

THE FAIRMONT (W. VA.) CASES.

Probably there is no better example to be found anywhere in proof of the need of this appeal legislation than the cases of the 25 clerks and carriers at Fairmont, W. Va., who resigned in concert because of the unjust treatment accorded three of their fellow workers. These men were subsequently arrested, tried for conspiracy, and fined sums ranging from $500 down to $5. While awaiting trial, one of the men, W. H. Fisher, a letter carrier, committed suicide.

I call your attention particularly to the resignations turned into the department by these men. You will note that the same thought—a lack of confidence in the administration of the civil service—runs through them all.

The February Union Postal Clerk printed the following article on the Fairmont trouble:

THE LESSON OF THE FAIRMONT STRIKE—THE MEN LOST FAITH IN THE CIVIL-SERVICE LAWS.

"Postal employees throughout the service were astounded to learn on November 17, 1915, that 25 clerks and carriers of the Fairmont (W. Va.) post office had resigned in concert as a protest against the unjust treatment accorded three of their fellow workers, who had been dismissed without a hearing. It was felt that the provocation must have been great to drive the ordinarily docile postal worker to such drastic action. And it was.

"We are printing the signed resignations of the men who walked out. These men were not irresponsible youths. Four of them had served 17 years in the service; three had served 13 years; all but eight had served 3 years or more. Their collective opinion of the civil service and its administration in the Postal Service is an opinion that comes with experience. And the men were about unanimous in pronouncing civil-service laws inadequate in so far as affording protection against official incompetency is concerned.

"These 24 resignations are that many indictments against the civil service as an institution and the present postal administration. Seventeen of the men expressed their helplessness to protest against the alleged incompetency of the postmaster. He was the political appointee of the present administration and the men felt the futility of appealing over his head to Washington for relief. Eighteen of the men quit as a protest against the dismissal of three fellow employees. They knew what every postal employee knows—the department can "get" you, and you have no appeal, no chance for a hearing. They feared the departmental wrath and forestalled it by resigning. Fifteen of the men recorded the view that the civil-service laws afford no protection to employees against unjust attacks of political officials. This is a self-evident truth. Five of the men expressed the thought that the inspector, the eye of the department, as he is known to be, was unfair in his attitude and biased in his judgment. Anyone familiar with the farcical investigations conducted by inspectors will readily believe this complaint well grounded.

"The same thought runs through all the resignations. The same idea that nothing would be done to remedy the wrong inflicted—if wrong had been inflicted—permeates each letter. The men lost faith in the adequacy of the civil-service laws, they lost hope in securing justice from the postal administration. And there was no appeal from the arbitrary judgment of the Washington officials who sit in the high places and pass sentence with such an unswerving degree of rightcousness that no mere employee may, with safety, question their wisdom.

"These Fairmont resignations question the wisdom of trying to conduct a Postal Service as it is now conducted. Unless the lesson is heeded and this arbitrary power taken from the hands of political and department bureaucrats the danger of employees, especially employees who have not been educated through organization in the efficacy of their own power to obtain legislative relief, resorting to drastic action is ever present.

"It is because we of the federation realize the need of protecting the civil service as an institution from the clutches of those who care nothing for it, and less for those who work within it, that we are asking the Congress for the right of a hearing before a detached tribunal when charges affecting vitally our personal interests are preferred against us.

"Read and analyze these resignations. Mark the important sections and mail the article to your Congressman, telling him to make such an occurrence impossible in his district by voting for the Keating bill, which gives employees the right to appeal from the findings of a post-office inspector and the hasty subsequent judgment of a departmental official."

WHY THEY RESIGNED.

SIR: I herewith tender my resignation as clerk in the Fairmont (W. Va.) post office, to take effect November 16, 1915, at midnight.

The present postmaster, Charles E. Manley, is entirely incompetent to manage the affairs of the Fairmont post office, and also the said Charles E. Manley will be involved in a public scandal in a short time that will make the office of postmaster a disgrace to Fairmont, and I do not care to remain under the circumstances.

Respectfully,

A. L. B. DUDLEY,
Assistant Superintendent Mails.

SIR: I do hereby tender my resignation as clerk in the post office at Fairmont, W. Va., to take effect at midnight on the day this letter is mailed, for the following reasons:

Since Charles E. Manley has taken charge of the Fairmont post office there has been a continual uproar and dissatisfaction among all the employees of the Fairmont post office, for the reason that Manley is discourteous to his clerks and has made his threats on the streets "to the victor belongs the spoils," and from the treatment given Messrs. Brand, Cochran, and Burton he has signified that the threat is to be carried out.

I regret to give up my position, but I feel that I can not afford to lower my dignity to serve under a man of his caliber and questioned character.

Very respectfully,

RUSSELL CLAYTON, Clerk.

SIR: I tender my resignation, effective November 16, at midnight; the reason why, for injustice against Mr. Brand and other employees, also because I have been mistreated by Charles E. Manley, as I am an Italian by birth, but am an American citizen, and have been called by Charles E. Manley "blackhander" any time he had a chance; and as I am a gentleman, I can not stand it any longer.

And the said Charles E. Manley, now postmaster, is not fit to be a postmaster, as he is ignorant and no gentleman.

Very respectfully,

F. A. CIRMOS, Clerk.

SIR: As a clerk in the Fairmont (W. Va.) post office, please accept my resignation, to take effect this date, for the following reasons:

I have been in the employ of the post office for 13 years and have never had a complaint from the patrons of the office or from the department, but owing to the discharge of Assistant Postmaster Wilbur H. Brand, Clerk Perry D. Burton, and Carrier George P. Cochran without any just cause, I do not feel that I have any protection under the present postmaster, Charles E. Manley, who is unfit, incompetent, and discourteous to his employees, and also owing to the discourteous and disrespectful treatment received by me at the hands of Mr. A. J. Knight, post-office inspector, and I do not feel that the civil service gives any protection to my position.

This resignation to take effect at 12 o'clock midnight.

Respectfully,

W. L. SATTERFIELD, Clerk.

SIR: I herewith resign my position in the Fairmont post office, the same to take effect at midnight on November 16, 1915, for the following reasons:

First. For the reason that W. H. Brand, Perry D. Burton, and George P. Cochran were removed from the service without a just cause.

Second. For the reason that the civil service affords no protection to post-office clerks whatsoever.

Third. I have been employed in the post office at Fairmont, W. Va., since December 1, 1911, and during that time my services have been entirely satisfactory to both our former postmaster, A. Howard Fleming, and the patrons of the office, and I do not wish to have unjust charges filed against me.

Very respectfully,

CHARLES L. BARTLETT, Clerk.

SIR: I have been employed in the Fairmont post office for the past eight years, as both stamp clerk and general-delivery clerk, and since Charles E. Manley has been postmaster things have been so unpleasant I feel that I can no longer endure the embarrassing things I have to face at the windows, as it seems Charles E. Manley, postmaster, has told every patron that he intends to fire all the clerks in the office—sure there is some fire where there is so much smoke—so I hereby tender my resignation, to take effect at midnight November 16, 1915, with the kindest feelings toward the administration.

Very respectfully,

CHARLES A. ROBINSON, Clerk.

SIR: I herewith tender my resignation as mailing clerk in the Fairmont post office, to take effect at once.

The present postmaster, Charles E. Manley, is discourteous. As a representative of the Post Office Department at Washington, D. C., he is ignorant, unfair to his employees, and has made his threats to disregard the civil-service rules, which have been carried out by your representative, Mr. A. J. Knight, post-office inspector, who has taken the postmaster's advice rather than the testimony that was given him.

I feel that there is no longer any protection given employees, and I do not care to work under a man that is so unfair.

Very truly,

J. A. COCHRAN, Clerk.

SIR: I hereby tender my resignation as substitute clerk in the post office at Fairmont, W. Va., for the following reasons:

First. Because of the charges preferred and acted upon against W. H. Brand, Perry Burton, and George P. Cochran, which, in my opinion, are grossly unjust.

Second. I have always been a man of truth and veracity, and Charles E. Manley, on a previous date asked me to tell a falsehood for him, and owing to the position which I was holding then, I was either compelled to comply with the same or receive a reprimand from Charles E. Manley, postmaster.

Third. I know that he is incompetent, for the reason that he is not informed in post-office work, and never will be, as he is not competent of being instructed. Effective at midnight, November 16, 1915.

Very respectfully,

JOHN F. SHAFFER, Substitute Clerk.

SIR: I hereby tender my resignation as clerk in the Fairmont, W. Va., post office, to take effect at midnight, November 16, 1915, for the following reasons:

As a result of the very unpleasant conditions in the post office since the present postmaster, Charles E. Manley, has taken charge, and owing to his inability to conduct the post office, and his discourtesy to the clerks.

And in view of the fact that the civil service is being ignored in the dismissal of employees, I feel that it would do me honor to resign my position before I am forced out of the service through charges which may be preferred against me unjustly, as has been done heretofore with my fellow employees.

Very respectfully, HARVEY A. PITZER, Clerk.

SIR: You will please accept my resignation as clerk in the Fairmont post office, to take effect at midnight on November 16, 1915, for the reason that I do not care to work under the direction of Charles E. Manley, postmaster at Fairmont, W. Va.

He is uncouth and ignorant, and unfit to occupy the position he is trying to fill; therefore I consider it beneath my dignity to work under him and recognize him as my superior.

Yours, truly, FRANK R. BARNES, Clerk.

SIR: I hereby tender my resignation as clerk in the Fairmont, W. Va., post office, to take effect at midnight November 16, 1915, for the following reasons:

First. That after eight years' service, without a spot or blemish against my efficiency as a clerk, I feel that I am unable any longer to work under the direction of the present postmaster, Charles E. Manley. He is ignorant, uncouth, illiterate, discourteous to employees, and in every particular absolutely incompetent to fill the position he now occupies.

Second. That he has repeatedly made the assertion in public that he proposed to clean house and remove all Republicans from the service and replace them with Democrats, without regard to their character or ability.

Third. In view of the action taken by the said postmaster, resulting in the removal of Wilbur H. Brand, Perry D. Burton, and George P. Cochran, under the civil service, and supposed to have the same protection thereunder as I have, I feel that it is only a matter of time until the said postmaster and the Democratic administration would succeed in depriving me of the position I now and have occupied under civil service. Feeling that the civil-service rules and regulations are no longer a protection to employees thereunder and that all positions will be given to Democrats, I can no longer serve in the position I now occupy with the same degree of enthusiasm and efficiency, therefore I feel that it would be right that I tender my resignation, which I now do, to take effect to-day.

Very respectfully, RAYMOND HALLER, Clerk.

SIR: During the administration of former Postmaster A. Howard Fleming, my association in the Fairmont post office was very pleasant, but since the present postmaster, Charles E. Manley, took charge of the office, there has never been the pleasant, genial feeling among the employees that formerly existed.

It has been my understanding that post-office clerks were protected by the civil service, until I recently witnessed the dismissal of my fellow employees, Wilbur H. Brand, Perry D. Burton, and George P. Cochran, after they had exonerated themselves.

I have the knowledge that very serious charges will be filed with your department against Charles E. Manley, postmaster, in which I have been required to testify against him, and I feel it my duty to myself to hand you my resignation, to take effect at once.

Very respectfully,

SYLVESTER CLAYTON,
Superintendent of Mails.

SIR: I wish to resign my position as city letter carrier at the Fairmont, W. Va., post office, for the reason that I believe some of my fellow workmen have been improperly removed from the service, and after Mr. A. J. Knight pretended to investigate the charges, he evidently gave out as a result of his investigation a Washington news article casting a reflection upon the honesty of all the employees of the Fairmont post office. Charles E. Manley has also been discourteous to one of my fellow employees in particular, Walter I. Willey, and I also feel that the civil service offers little protection; this resignation to take effect to-day.

Very respectfully, E. B. HARDEN.

SIR: Owing to the unpleasant conditions existing in the Fairmont post office, as a result of charges falsely brought against my fellow employee, which caused his dismissal from the service, and the recommendation of the inspector investigating the charges, caused a Washington news article to be published throughout West Virginia, casting a certain reflection upon the honesty of all my fellow workmen, and also because I believe the civil service of the United States no longer protects me, I desire to resign my position as city letter carrier; the same to take effect to-day.

Very respectfully, WILL H. FISHER.

SIR: This letter is to inform you that I have decided to leave the Postal Service, because of the dismissal of some of my fellow workmen, which I believe was grossly unjust, and also because of the uncalled-for and very discourteous treatment received by Walter Willey, substitute letter carrier, at the hands of Postmaster Charles E. Manley, and for the further reason that I believe the civil service of the United States offers no protection. This resignation effective to-day at the close of business.

Very respectfully, JAS. W. PHILLIPS.

SIR: I desire to resign my position as city letter carrier in the Fairmont, W. Va., post office, effective at the close of business to-day, since I feel that injustice has been done to my fellow employees in their removal from the service, and I feel that the civil service no longer protects me.

Very respectfully. CHARLES O. HAYHURST.

SIR: I wish to inform you that conditions in the Fairmont post office have not been very pleasant since Charles E. Manley took charge of the office; since he has gone to the department and filed trumped-up charges against some of my fellow employees, resulting in their removal from the service. Because Mr. Manley is permitted to remove employees unjustly, I feel that it would be honorable for me to tender my resignation as city letter carrier at the Fairmont post office, to take effect to-day.

Very respectfully, J. T. KRAMER.

SIR: I desire to resign my position as city letter carrier in the Fairmont post office, effective at the close of business to-day, since I feel that injustice has been done to my fellow employees in their removal from the service, and I feel that the civil service no longer protects me.

Very respectfully,

HARRY C. PITZER.

SIR: I desire to give up my position as city letter carrier in the Fairmont, W. Va., post office, for the reason that I believe great injustice has been done by Charles E. Manley, postmaster, in removing some of my fellow employees from the service on trumped-up charges, and as a result of their investigation by Mr. A. J. Knight, post-office inspector, the Washington news article of November 13, 1915, cast reflection upon the honesty of every employee in the Fairmont post office, this article being published broadcast in West Virginia. This resignation to take effect to-day.

Very respectfully. W. G. SATTERFIELD.

SIR: I am tendering my resignation as city letter carrier in the Fairmont post office, the same to take effect to-day. The reason why I do this is that I believe some of my fellow employees have been unjustly removed from the Postal Service, by the use of trumped-up charges, and when a postmaster is permitted to overstep the bounds of justice in removing employees in this manner, there is certainly no use for the civil service.

Very respectfully, H. S. KOPP.

SIR: I desire to resign my position as city letter carrier at the Fairmont, W. Va., post office, the same effective this evening. The reason I wish to leave the service is because of the seeming unjust and unfair treatment received at the hands of Charles E. Manley by some of my fellow employees, he filing unjust charges against them resulting in their dismissal from the service, and also for the reason that the civil service of the United States affords no protection.

Very respectfully,

EDWARD E. HALE.

SIR: I am not pleased with the manner in which some of my associates in the post office have been removed from the service by false charges preferred against them by our postmaster, which has caused many of the employees to lose confidence in the civil service, and Mr. Manley, the postmaster, has tried to even evade the postal laws in appointing city carriers. This is my resignation, effective to-day.

Very respectfully,

HYSON CHRISTIE.

SIR: It is not my desire to remain any longer as substitute city letter carrier in the Fairmont post office, because I am convinced that some of my closest friends and fellow workmen have been unfairly removed from the Postal Service; and as long as these conditions exist and the postmaster is permitted to dismiss employees on trumped-up charges, I fail to understand the purpose of the civil service of the United States.

This resignation effective to-day.

Very respectfully, JOSEPH F. BENDER.

SIR: I hereby tender my resignation as substitute city letter carrier at the Fairmont, W. Va., post office, the same to take effect now.

My reason for leaving the service is that I have been most discourteously treated by the present postmaster, he having cursed me in his private office, and demanding my resignation at once, in the presence of Assistant Postmaster Wilbur H. Brand.

The unfair and unjust dismissal of some of my fellow employees from the Postal Service is also a reason for my resignation.

Very respectfully,

WALTER S. WILLEY.

NEWSPAPER COMMENTS.

That the public generally is aware of the need of curbing the arbitrary power of departmental officials by granting the employees the right of a hearing and appeal is shown in the following news items gathered at random from the press of the country:

[From the Washington (D. C.) Star.]

A DEPARTMENTAL APPEALS COURT.

Representative KEATING'S bill to give the classified civil-service employees a right of appeal to the Federal Board of Mediation and Conciliation in cases of demotion or dismissal is inspired by certain instances of alleged injustice in the Post Office Department. The suggestor of the bill, an officer of the National Federation of Post Office Clerks, declares that there has been a loss of confidence in the efficacy of the civil-service laws for the protection of the worker. It is undeniable that civil-service employees are subject to dismissal virtually without citation of cause if the head of the department so wills. And it can not be denied that the exercise of this power tends to demoralize the service. No business establishment can succeed on the basis of causeless dismissals. The United States should be conducted on the same principle. The essential spirit of the civil-service law is one of guaranty of tenure during good behavior and efficiency. Theoretically political considerations are eliminated. Actually, in practice, unfortunately they have not been, and tenure is uncertain in some departments.

Whether the medium proposed by the Keating bill, the Board of Mediation and Conciliation, is the most effective possible as a check against baseless, unwarranted demotions and dismissals is to be considered. Theoretically the Civil Service Commission itself has jurisdiction over this question, but actually the clerks have no appeal under the present system from any arbitrary action. By means of manipulated efficiency records, it may be, a showing of incapacity can be made against a clerk whose position is wanted. Only through the operation of some sort of appeals board or court of review can devices of this kind be checked to give the civil employee that degree of protection from partisan action and injustice that the civil-service law in its essence theoretically provides.

A NATIONAL BLACK LIST.

The largest industry in America, if not in the world, is the United States Postal Service. In this service there prevails a most vicious system of blacklisting.

As Thomas F. Flaherty, secretary-treasurer of the National Federation of Post Office Clerks, put it, "A postal clerk might as well have his hands cut off as be dismissed from the service." Such a clerk is practically debarred forever from working at the only trade he knows.

This blacklisting is done at the whim of a bunch of politically appointed inspectors, who peep through slits cut into the walls where the clerks are working. The word of these inspectors holds against anything the clerks may say.

The only protection against this vicious autocratic autocracy is an organization of the postal employees strong enough to procure a share in the management of the industry for the employees. This every little would-be tyrant in the post office will fight.

[From the New York Chief.]

IS THE GOVERNMENT "ON THE SQUARE"?

With the introduction in Congress of a bill providing a "court hearing" for employees who have a grievance the question arises, Is the Government on the square? The workings of the Government are so varied and complex that heads of departments, of bureaus and divisions, or others in authority can not be laid down by rule, nor can their doings be recorded and gauged according to results obtained, as in commercial work. Personal dislikes, jealousies, political and religious differences, and other reasons offer those in power temptations to oust otherwise efficient and faithful employees, and the unfortunate employee has no redress.

Uncle Sam requires an applicant for a position in his service to be entirely efficient and well qualified. Many appointees study and make sacrifices for months and years in order to qualify for appointment. When appointed, he represents the best worker in his line. What a pity he is at the mercy of a petty officer who may for some reason take a dislike to him.

Skilled employees working for any of the great industrial concerns not only receive good pay for their services, but they are protected against any discrimination by the boss. They stand together. The employer knows that he must give a fair deal.

Must the Government be forced to give its employees a fair deal as the skilled workmen force the manufacturer to give them a square shake? The employees of the Government are of a class that would make no unreasonable demands, nor should it be necessary for them to place their needs before the Government in the form of demands. It is only necessary that they make their needs plain, so that they will be understood and appreciated, and the Government will do the rest.

The law provides courts that the people may have justice. If a man interferes with or takes away the rights of another he is invited to talk to the judge. When an employee is reduced in salary for no reason other than the personal whims of a man in authority, that employee is deprived of his constitutional rights, and he should at least have an opportunity to state his case before an impartial judge or board.

[From the Rural Free Delivery News, official organ of the Rural Letter Carriers' Association.]

A CIVIL-SERVICE COURT OF APPEALS.

The case of the assistant postmaster at Winnetka, Ill., whose cold-blooded, arbitrary dismissal from the Postal Service and reinstatement by a peremptory order of the President, has laid emphasis upon the growing need of a civil-service tribunal to which appeals of dismissed employees may be made. The Winnetka case is the only instance that has come to our attention wherein the Chief Executive of the Nation has intervened to save a postal employee from the autocratic power of departmental officials.

While the alleged offense of the assistant postmaster was trivial, it was perhaps more serious than the charges which in many instances have been preferred against rural carriers. At all events the charges in the Winnetka case were direct and covered a specific alleged offense, while in many cases of dismissed rural carriers the charges were vague, general, and indirect, and covered no specific violation of the postal laws and regulations.

A case in point is that of Carrier Marion Enyeart, of Warren, Ind., the record of which will be found on another page in this issue of the Rural Free Delivery News. The charges against Enyeart were so vague and indefinite that proper answer could not be made. Particulars were demanded by the accused, but the request was ignored, and in due course the carrier was dismissed without knowledge of a specific charge or opportunity to face his accusers. Such procedure smacks too strongly of despotism to be long tolerated in a free country in this enlightened age.

The remedy is a civil-service court of appeals to which all charges against civil-service employees should be referred for investigation and action. Charges should be as specific as in any other court, and the accused should be given opportunity to face his accusers, present witnesses, and do everything possible in his own defense, and the decision of the court should be based upon the law and the evidence in the case.

Civil service to-day is a joke and a farce. Examinations are held to determine the relative fitness of applicants, but under the present system there is no assurance that the candidate making the best grade will be appointed, and after appointment and perhaps years of faithful, efficient service there is no guaranty of permanent employment. The simple charge "for the good of the service," by an official of a few months or even a few weeks' experience in office, is sufficient to cause the dismissal of a faithful employee with a clean record.

The civil-service laws should either be repealed altogether or amended and strengthened so as to give assurance of permanent employment as a reward for efficient service. Arbitrary power of dismissal by officials upon flimsy and vague charges, without full opportunity for defense, should be withdrawn. The substance of reward for faithful service should be made more substantial and the shadow of fear of unjust dismissal more shadowy.

FOR RIGHT OF HEARING IN THE FEDERAL SERVICE.

Several bills to provide for the right of hearing for merit employees in the United States service in cases relating to dismissal are pending in Congress. Tenure during good behavior and efficiency in service is one of the foundation principles of every civil-service act. But the Federal law, lacking the so-called trial clause of the best municipal and State civil-service statutes, has been found wanting as to the approved means for putting that principle into effect.

To the objection that the Federal service is scattered over a vast area, rendering the holding of trials difficult, there is a complete answer in the district system followed by the United States Civil Service Commission as to examinations. If district examining officers can conduct impartial examinations, district trial officers could conduct impartial trials.

Let Congress provide a trial clause for the Federal civil-service law and thus remedy one of its greatest defects.

APPEAL RIGHTS FOR POSTAL WORKERS ASKED.

The Keating bill, sponsored by Congressman EDWARD KEATING, of Colorado, chairman of the labor group in the House, seeks to grant to employees in the classified civil service the right to appeal from the judgment of their respective department heads in cases affecting their wages, rights, and positions.

The Keating bill enables the worker who feels that his dismissal or demotion has been unjustified to appeal to the United States Board of Mediation and Conciliation by filing a written statement setting forth the cause for the appeal and specifying the relief sought and submitting any evidence germane to the case. The board shall have power to appoint investigators, to subpœna witnesses, to take testimony, administer oaths, and to require any Government official or employee to produce books or papers relating to any appeal under investigation. Testimony shall be taken in the county where the witness resides, when the same can be conveniently done.

The big principle, for which this federation has led the fight—the right of appeal—is embodied in the Keating bill. It will strip from the political heads of departments their arbitrary power to demote, degrade, and dismiss. With the Board of Mediation empowered to review decisions and examine records the departmental bureaucrats, whose shameful misuse of supreme power has cowed the service workers into pitiful subjection, will proceed more cautiously in future in visiting their political or personal vengeance against the lowly subordinate. The mere fact that their official actions will be subject to scrutiny by an outside tribunal will cause the zealous head-hunters to be less free in swinging the ax.

By endeavoring to extend the powers of a board already in existence rather than create a new court the Keating bill overcomes two obstacles at the start. It will cost but little, if anything, and it will not meet with the opposition existing in Congress to the creation of additional courts or commissions.

The Board of Mediation already performs a function closely akin to the duties the Keating legislation requires of it. The board has salaried officials, trained investigators, offices, and office help; all the machinery is at hand to bring relief, hope, and a greater degree of freedom to the workers of the Postal Service.

The Keating bill is No. 9921. Have your local labor bodies indorse it. Write your Congressman and tell him why you want the bill to pass. It is your bill of rights. It is worth a great deal to you. It safeguards your job. Act at once!

FAIR PLAY IN THE CIVIL SERVICE.

Recently there was introduced in the National House of Representatives by Congressman EDWARD KEATING, of Colorado, a bill which provides a measure of fair treatment for Government employees in the classified civil service.

The bill merely extends to the man who is working under civil-service regulations the privilege enjoyed by every American citizen, namely, the right to an impartial hearing by an unbiased tribunal whenever he is accused or dismissed or penalized for some alleged infraction of the regulations under which he is employed.

While all must agree that proper discipline is essential to honest service, there have been numerous instances of injustice toward subordinates by persons in "a little brief authority," and it is to remedy this that the Keating bill was introduced in Congress.

As a general proposition the civil service is beneficial to those who are employed under it as well as to the public. It makes for that degree of efficiency which every conscientious worker attains when his position is fairly secure against unfair discrimination, and is, therefore, a valuable adjunct of the public service, for which reason it deserves to be protected in its integrity against the antics of those who may be inclined to violate its principles for personal or political reasons.

The proposed Keating bill aims to correct a great evil. It gives the worker the right to appeal against the exercise of arbitrary authority unjustly exercised and to obtain from the United States Board of Mediation and Conciliation a full hearing of all the facts in his case whenever he may be demoted or dismissed.

The details are fully set forth in the bill. Its passage will have the effect of causing officials in authority to act justly toward subordinates. The measure does not encourage insubordination, it does not diminish proper discipline, but its enactment will have the effect of protecting employees in the positions that were obtained by them through rigid preparation and patient effort.

The civil-service system is capable of abuse by those who should be the most persistent in upholding it, and there can be none too many safeguards against inequity in this respect. Every employee working under its provisions is entitled to such a full and impartial hearing as the Keating bill provides whenever he feels that he has been unjustly dealt with.

DISCIPLINE IN THE POST OFFICE.

Necessity for discipline in the various post offices of the country is recognized by all thoughtful citizens. On the other hand, one realizes the possibility of gross injustice an unchecked martinet might do to helpless subordinates. As we have frequently pointed out, the position of the postal clerk is unique. The postal business is a Government monopoly. If the clerk quits or is discharged he can find no other market for the special information and special skill he has acquired. His utter helplessness in a contest with his superior is so obvious as to throw discredit on the strange story that St. Louis postal clerks had formed a secret league to embarrass the postmaster, who has it in his power to ruin their future. The fact that the postmaster, according to his own admissions in his service publication, discharged two employees, whom he suspected falsely, as we know, of being responsible for the appearance of certain matters in the Globe-Democrat, is an evidence of the danger of the unrestricted power now exercised. The right of appeal from the decision of a judge who is also prosecuting attorney, witness, and jury, should be conceded. The whole future of an employee should not be at the mercy of the whim of one man, moved by mixed motives and often strongly prejudiced. The fact that persons suspected of breathing intimations reflecting on the postmaster are remorselessly pursued while there has been no rebuke of signers of articles in the newspapers giving the postmaster credit for achievements which the record proves belonged to his predecessor, tends to shake public confidence in the lofty disinterestedness of the postmaster's policy of repression.

While we are not prepared to judge of all the questions discussed in the comprehensive article by Thomas F. Flaherty, secretary-treasurer of the National Federation of Post Office Clerks, published yesterday, his ex parte statement is very persuasive. Some of his findings are supported by an independent investigation. He raises some points which should challenge the attention of Congress, since the good of the service and the human rights of the postal employees are both involved.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the amendment is subject to the point of order, and sustains the point of order.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. A great deal has been said here to-day in reference to the administration of the postal laws, especially with relation to the rural service. Reference has been made to the desire of the department to economize in that service. It has been pointed out, I think, that this attempt to economize has been disastrous to the efficiency of the service, and it has affected the country generally without regard to political complexion. It has affected the Democratic districts as well as the Republican districts, so that partisanship in that regard can not be charged, but the fault, it seems to me, lies in the theory of the Post Office Department as to what their duties are. I tried to point that out in my opening remarks, but I will repeat it. Two years ago, on account of the failure of the Underwood law to produce sufficient revenue for the Government, there being a large general deficit in the Treasury, the Post Office Department proposed to save $20,000,000 by putting the rural service on the contract basis, and they brought in that proposition to the committee, and in other ways they wanted to economize—not because the Postal Service was not then self-sustaining, but because they said they wanted to make up the general deficit. I criticized it at that time. This year they have a new reason, as I believe, and that is that they are wrestling with a white elephant in the person of the parcel post. They claim in their statements that they are making $10,000,000 on the parcel post, but I think their own figures will convince any unbiased man of the fact that they are losing from $16,000,000 to $30,000,000 on that item, and, for that reason, there is now a postal deficit. They are trying to make good for mistakes they have made in that branch by curtailing the rural service, and that is the cause of all their trouble.

If these gentlemen who belong to the majority party would go to the President of the United States or to the Postmaster General and convince him that the rural service should not be the victim of their mistakes in other directions, I think the policy could and would be corrected. The fault is in the policy of the department in carrying on this service. To obtain efficient service there must be a large discretion vested in the administrative officers, and the more we hamper the discretion of the department the more trouble we are going to get into. I believe that the discretion lodged in the Post Office Department, when wisely exercised, will restore the rural service to its former efficiency. I will undertake to say that if you will give me, or any other good Republican who has a sound theory of the purposes of the service, the authority as Postmaster General for 60 days it would be restored to its former efficiency in every branch and every section of the country. I speak of this because this clause provides for taking out of the Treasury the sum required to make up for the deficit.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEENERSON. Yes.

Mr. GOOD. The gentleman's idea is that we can not make a good official out of a bad one, but that we must relegate to the people at the polls the correction of that evil?

Mr. STEENERSON. Yes. My theory is that you can drive a horse to water but that you can not make him drink. These men have the law, but they refuse to exercise any discretion in the proper direction and serve the people as they ought to be served. The only thing to do is to discharge them and get new administrative officers. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn.

There was no objection.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BENNET. We are about to begin now the reading of the numbered sections. Will they be considered by the entire numbered section or by paragraphs?

Mr. FINLEY. They will be considered by sections.

Mr. BENNET. Each numbered section is divided into paragraphs, and my inquiry is whether they are to be considered by paragraphs or by sections.

Mr. MOON. They are by sections.

Mr. BENNET. Each numbered by itself?

Mr. MOON. Yes.

Mr. BENNET. Will the whole section be read before it is in order to make the point of order?

Mr. MOON. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. The railway mail proposition is one entire section.

Mr. MOON. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. It would be better, if we are to have an opportunity to amend it, to have it read by paragraphs, rather than to consider it in bulk.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I ask the Clerk to read section 2.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I would like an answer to my inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hold that it will be read by sections.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That hereafter the Postmaster General shall have authority and he is hereby empowered to assess and collect a sum of money, or fee, not in excess of 75 per cent of the present rates of bonds now in force, from each officer and employee of the Postal Service with the United States of America through the Post Office Department who are now, or hereafter may be, required by law to give bond, and to create and establish with the money or moneys derived from such assessments and collections a guaranty fund to indemnify the United States of America for losses incurred because of, or by reason of, the failure of any of the said officers or employees to faithfully perform and discharge, or for improperly performing and discharging, the duties and obligations imposed on the said officers or employees by reason of their acceptance of such office or employment, and a sum of money or fee not in excess of the rates of bonds now in force from each contractor with the United States of America through the Post Office Department who are now, or hereafter may be, required by law to give bond by reason of their acceptance or execution of such contract.

And the Postmaster General is further authorized and empowered to prescribe such regulations as may be necessary to create and maintain a guaranty fund and to pay in full from such guaranty fund any person or persons who have incurred or suffered loss or losses for which the United States is liable: Provided, That any officer or employee may give bond, with surety or sureties approved by the Postmaster General, in lieu of and in the place of, an assessment for or contribution to the said guaranty fund: Provided further, That the Postmaster General may, in his discretion, require and secure a bond for the faithful and proper performance and discharge of the duties and obligations of any office or employment in addition to the assessment for and contribution to the said guaranty fund: And provided further, That the premium of such bond shall be charged against and paid from the said guaranty fund: And provided further, That the establishment and operation of said system shall be without additional cost to the Government.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order on the section.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I think the point of order is well taken and ought to be sustained.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD upon this section.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, no remarks have been made upon the section. How is the gentleman going to extend remarks that have not been made upon the section?

Mr. MADDEN. I suggest to the gentleman that it will be up for debate later on, and he will have an opportunity to speak upon it.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw my request.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the gentleman in what way it will come up later on?

Mr. MADDEN. Under a rule.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Has that been decided upon?

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I will state to the House that my information is that the Committee on Rules will bring in a rule that has been agreed upon which will make in order all of this matter which we strike out of the bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does that include those small items that have previously been stricken out?

Mr. MOON. It includes every single item in this bill which was subject to the point of order.

Mr. STAFFORD. It may meet the same fate that it did two years ago.

Mr. BENNET. Of course, the gentleman understands that there is a possibility that the House will vote down the rule.

Mr. MOON. Of course. This is a matter under the control of the House, and if the House wants to vote down the rule, I certainly would be the last man to object to it.

Mr. BENNET. Therefore the gentleman from Maryland might not get another opportunity to extend his remarks.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman will have an opportunity to talk on the rule.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Chairman, I demand the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The regular order is demanded, and the Clerk will read the next section.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. That the third proviso of the act of May 4, 1882 (22 Stat. L., chap. 116, p. 54), be amended as follows:

"If any person shall hereafter perform any service for any contractor or subcontractor in carrying the mail, he shall, upon filing in the department his contract for such service and satisfactory evidence of its performance, thereafter have a lien on any money due such contractor or subcontractor for such service to the amount of same; and if such contractor or subcontractor shall fail to pay the party or parties who have performed service as aforesaid the amount due for such service within two months after the expiration of the month in which such service shall have been performed the Postmaster General may cause the amount due to be paid said party or parties and charged to the contractor: Provided, That such payment shall not in any case exceed the rate of pay per annum of the contractor or subcontractor."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Does the gentleman know whether this provision is one of the provisions that have been reported to the Senate by the committee over there as a Senate amendment to the postal savings-bank bill?

Mr. MOON. I will say to the gentleman this and several other sections of this bill have been placed upon the postal bill in the Senate amendment, but we thought it wise not to leave them off here until some action is taken upon that bill. In the event that that bill is passed there and the House concurs in those amendments it will only be necessary to strike out those matters from this bill.

Mr. MANN. My recollection is that the bill the other day in the Senate was sought to be taken up, and there was some likelihood of its being taken up.

Mr. MOON. I think it is likely, and if it is taken up and passed and comes over here and is concurred in it will be unnecessary to further consider this section, but we thought it best to leave all on until some action was taken over there. I will ask the Clerk to read.

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment will be considered as withdrawn——

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, this is the first time I have been taken off the floor.

Mr. MOON. I thought the gentleman had finished.

Mr. MANN. I was going to ask why this language was put in here.

Mr. MOON. I can tell the gentleman in a moment. Does the gentleman desire to go back to that section?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood that the gentleman had yielded the floor.

Mr. MOON. I did also, otherwise I would not have asked the Clerk to proceed.

Mr. MANN. What is the purpose of this provision?

Mr. MOON. I can best state it in the words of the department:

Under existing law when a contractor on a mail route fails to compensate a carrier for service performed for such contractor within two months after the expiration of the quarter in which such service shall have been performed, the Postmaster General may cause the amount due to be paid to the carrier and charged to the contractor; and to wait two months after the expiration of the quarter in such cases imposes undue hardship upon the carrier, to whom it would be a great help if the Postmaster General were authorized to act as indicated when two months had elapsed after the expiration of the month rather than the quarter in which the service was performed.

Mr. MANN. Of course, I have read the provision in the bill and know that part of it; and let me ask the gentleman: This bill is in the interest of the subcontractors?

Mr. MOON. I think so.

Mr. MANN. What object has the Government in inviting men to take contracts for the carrying of mail and then subletting them? At times in the past that was the greatest evil with the star-route service that ever came before Congress in connection with any service.

Mr. MOON. I think the purpose of the Government is an equitable one, in view of the fact that the men who do the work should get the pay, and that the time in which they should get it should be as short as possible under existing conditions.

Mr. MANN. It is an invitation in the screen-wagon service for a man to get a contract with no intention whatever of doing the work, but with the intention of subletting the contract to somebody else who will really do the work. I am inclined to think——

Mr. MOON. We can not say what is in the minds of men about these things.

Mr. MANN. What did the gentleman say?

Mr. MOON. We can not tell what the minds of men may be about a matter of that sort.

Mr. MANN. But we can tell whether that will be in the interest of subcontractors, whereas I should rather see legislation in favor of seeing the contractor who makes the contract carry it out.

Mr. MOON. Well, that is all right; but the gentleman realizes that the men who actually do the work are the men who ought to be paid.

Mr. MANN. Oh, I realize the fact that always under ordinary conditions the subcontractor ought to have a lien for his work, but this is a different thing entirely from furnishing material. Here is a case where a man takes a contract intending to sublet it and make a profit, a rake-off for himself, with no intention of doing the work.

Mr. MOON. Well, this is a mere change of the law in one respect, and I will call attention——

Mr. MANN. I understand.

Mr. MOON. The department says:

To wait two months after the expiration of the quarter in such cases imposes undue hardship upon the carrier, to whom it would be a great help if the Postmaster General were authorized to act as indicated when two months had elapsed after the expiration of the month rather than the quarter in which the service was performed.

It shortens the time, that is all.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 5. That whenever in the judgment of the Postmaster General the bids received for any star route are exorbitant or unreasonable, or whenever he has reason to believe that a combination of bidders has been entered into to fix the rate for star-route service, the Postmaster General be, and he is hereby, authorized, out of the appropriation for inland transportation by star routes, to employ and use such means or methods to provide the desired service as he may deem expedient, without reference to existing law or laws respecting the employment of personal service or the procurement of conveyances, materials, or supplies.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order largely for the purpose of obtaining information from some member of the committee. I wish to inquire as to what character of means it is contemplated the Postmaster General would use when he finds that a contract price on a star route is exorbitant or unreasonable? Here under this new authorization you allow him—

To employ and use such means and methods to provide the desired service as he may deem expedient.

Under that phraseology I take it he will be authorized to purchase an automobile delivery car and operate it on some of these far-western mountainous routes, or even to purchase horse-drawn vehicles for that character of service. I can not conceive what other means he would employ, because he may invite other bids if he finds the first exorbitant, and here he is authorized to disregard those bids and inaugurate a service of his own liking. This I consider very broad authority to be vested in the Postmaster General. Perhaps it is expedient and necessary, but I would like to ask some member of the committee what the hearings disclosed as to the methods he is to follow if he finds these prices exorbitant.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Chairman, I will say this to the gentleman——

Mr. STAFFORD. Can the gentleman direct me to the page of the hearings?

Mr. FINLEY. I have a letter here from the department.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is there anything in the hearings in support of this proposed paragraph?

Mr. FINLEY. There was in former years this condition——

Mr. STAFFORD. I do not care for former years. I do not recall any consideration, while I was a member of the Post Office Committee, on this special item.

Mr. FINLEY. I do.

Mr. STAFFORD. What year? Will the gentleman kindly refresh my memory?

Mr. FINLEY. In the last several years. The facts are these, if the gentleman wishes an answer. If he has not finished, I will wait until he gets through.

Mr. STAFFORD. I am asking if there is any testimony in the hearings.

Mr. FINLEY. There is nothing in this year's hearings. The facts are that sometimes the bids are exorbitant, at other times they are unreasonable, and on occasion there are combinations of bidders. Now, it is only in those three instances where this provision would apply. There is no question about it that there are combinations of bidders at times.

If the gentleman knows anything of the star-route service, he is aware of that fact. At times the bids are unreasonably high—higher than the service warrants—higher than there is any necessity for in order to compensate properly for the service rendered. And occasionally they are unreasonable. Now, it is only in those three instances where the Postmaster General seeks authority and power to make other arrangements. And, as I take it, there would not be many of those instances. In the congressional district which I represent there are less than 150 miles of star-route service, all told—less than 100, probably—but if one of those contracts is advertised, or if one is advertised in the gentleman's district, and the bids are unreasonably high, it does not follow that the Postmaster General, as a matter of efficiency in the Postal Service, or as a matter of business economy, would accept one of those bids; not at all. And those conditions do exist, I will say to the gentleman.

Mr. STAFFORD. I stated in my prefatory statement that I would concede that such conditions exist; but my question was what character of means he is going to employ when he finds such conditions existent.

Mr. FINLEY. He would employ reasonable means; and, I take it, he would secure some one who had not bid and make an arrangement with them for carrying the mail until such time as the service could be contracted for on a proper basis. There is nothing intended here, so far as I know, calculated to give the Postmaster General authority to purchase automobiles and all of that.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman will agree that the phraseology here will bear the construction to authorize him to purchase automobiles or other vehicles?

Mr. FINLEY. Then the gentleman, as I understand it, contends that he would institute a Government-conducted service?

Mr. STAFFORD. Well, there are other provisions of this bill where you authorize the Postmaster General to go into a Government owned and operated service so far as screen wagons are concerned.

Mr. FINLEY. That is very true.

Mr. STAFFORD. But I want to know whether it was contemplated, so far as the hearings show, that he purposed to extend the same policy on star routes where the bids were exorbitant?

Mr. FINLEY. I think the gentleman is unduly alarmed about that. There is no such intention so far as the committee is apprised, and I am satisfied there is not.

Mr. STAFFORD. I realize that there are instances where the department may be held up by a combination of local bidders, and there must be some means devised authorizing the Postmaster General to protect the Government by rejecting those bids. I thought the power would be sufficient if you would authorize him to call for new proposals rather than under this phraseology, which would carry the construction of authorizing the purchase of automobile trucks and other vehicles and performing a service under direct Government control.

Mr. FINLEY. Under the present law he has the right to reject any and all bids and to call for new proposals.

Mr. STAFFORD. He wants some further power which he has not at present and maybe establish a service by the purchase of some Government-owned vehicles.

Mr. FINLEY. I will say to the gentleman that probably there are not a great many instances where this condition that is complained of exists, but there are some where the service, as conducted and bid for under contracts now, is unreasonably high, and it is only intended to reach those cases. There are not many of them. It is not intended to conduct the Government service, so far as I am aware.

Mr. STAFFORD. Of course the gentleman appreciates that in the far western country since the increase of limit of weight the present Postmaster General provided for parcel-post packages of 20 to 50 pounds. The large supply houses are utilizing the mails by shipment of merchandise by parcel post which formerly went by freight, and naturally when this freightable parcel-post mail is carried on star routes the star-route carrier virtually becomes a freight purveyor rather than a postal purveyor, and that condition might incline the Postmaster General on those exceptional routes to purchase automobile trucks in order to carry this service at what he regards as a reasonable price.

Mr. FINLEY. He might use the railroad to transport freight if he saw fit.

Mr. STAFFORD. In these western communities where the star-route service is in vogue it is impossible to reach those inland post offices by railroad service. They are removed 30, 50, and sometimes 150 miles from the railroads and have to be covered by star routes.

Mr. FINLEY. I am aware of that; but I know of one instance where the railroad could be used for the transportation of freight. I know of one case in the far West where the railroad can be used, and where he would use the most available means in order to carry the mail and expedite the carriage of it. So I think no real objection can be lodged against this.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, if I thought that the Postmaster General would utilize this authority for going into the business of operating automobile trucks on isolated star routes in the Western States, or in any other part of the country, I would make a point of order, because I do not believe we should launch out upon that policy at the present time. But I realize that there are instances where the Postmaster General ought to have authority, in order to prevent the Government from being held up by collusion among bidders, and therefore I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. MANN. I reserve the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois reserves the point of order.

Mr. MANN. I judged, when I read this paragraph, that probably one of the purposes, undisclosed to the committee, was the introduction of aeroplanes in the Postal Service. The Postmaster General now has the authority to reject exorbitant bids and to reject bids where there is a combination among bidders. This confers no new authority upon him there. But this paragraph provides that the Postmaster General may employ such means or methods to provide the desired service as he may deem expedient, without reference to the existing law with reference to the employment of personal services or conveyances or materials or supplies.

The Post Office Department for several years has sought the privilege of carrying the mail over some of these star routes by aeroplanes. Perhaps that privilege ought to be given them, but up to date Congress has not directly done it. Now, it is the easiest thing in the world to say that a bid is exorbitant or that there is a combination among bidders. If there is more than one bidder, it is easy to say that there is a combination of bidders, in the opinion of the Postmaster General, and his decision is not subject to review; and thereupon he can put into service an aeroplane service, no matter how much it may cost. There is absolutely no limitation in the bill at all.

My friend from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] is afraid the Postmaster General will put in an automobile service. I have no doubt he will, because the House this afternoon, having expressed a decided opinion against the introduction of the automobile service in the Post Office Department, the Postmaster General and the officials under him, following the usual course of this administration, will do what they can in opposition to the wishes of the House. [Applause on the Republican side.] They will install automobile service in the star-route service where they can not put in the aeroplane service; and the aeroplane service being more expensive than the automobile service, the probabilities are that they will install the aeroplane service where it is possible to use it. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. I suppose the gentleman knows that the Second Assistant Postmaster General last year, in advocacy of the establishment of the aeroplane service, advanced the reason that it would shorten the star routes in mountainous States and thereby give quicker dispatch to the carriage of letter mail and merchandise?

Mr. MANN. I remember the subject very well, indeed, and that is the reason why I have said what I have. I have no doubt whatever that one of the purposes of this section, undisclosed to the committee, was to authorize the employment of aeroplane service, and perhaps that is the best thing that can be said of the section.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the paragraph.

Mr. MANN. I yield to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. FINLEY].

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Chairman, I have the following letter from the Postmaster General, which I wish to read. Here it is:

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE POSTMASTER GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., January 15, 1916.

Hon. JOHN A. MOON,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR JUDGE MOON: In letting contracts for the four-year term beginning July 1, 1914, in the fourth contract section, which includes about 4,500 routes in the Western and Southwestern States, it was found that many of the bidders were asking exorbitant rates to perform the required service. Owing to the limitations imposed by existing law, the department was forced to the necessity of accepting in many instances bids which were clearly exorbitant, and for the protection of the Government in such cases it would appear that the Postmaster General ought to be clothed with authority to provide, under similar circumstances, such service as he might deem expedient, and in order to render this possible I recommend that the following be enacted into law:

"That whenever in the judgment of the Postmaster General the bids received for any star route are exorbitant or unreasonable, or whenever he has reason to believe that a combination of bidders has been entered into to fix the rate for star-route service, the Postmaster General be, and he is hereby, authorized, out of the appropriation for inland transportation by star routes, to employ and use such means or methods to provide the desired service as he may deem expedient, without reference to existing law or laws respecting the employment of personal service or the procurement of conveyances, materials, or supplies."

Sincerely, yours,

A. S. BURLESON,
Postmaster General.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, if it were not for the fact that this is a serious subject it would seem like opera bouffe. A few minutes ago the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] intimated that this section would authorize the Postmaster General to utilize automobiles in the star-route service, and the distinguished gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. FINLEY] stated that that was not the intention of the committee. He said they had no such thought. When I suggested that the section would authorize the use of aeroplanes, the gentleman from South Carolina read a letter from the Postmaster General, stating that the very purpose of the section is to permit the use of automobiles and not aeroplanes. [Laughter to the Republican side.]

Mr. FINLEY. If the gentleman will permit——

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. FINLEY. It is simply to change the law, so that contractors for carrying star-route mail may use automobiles.

Mr. MANN. That is not a change of the law at all. The fact is that the gentleman from South Carolina has not looked at this bill since it was reported on January 31.

Mr. FINLEY. Oh, the gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. MANN. Well, then, the gentleman has looked at it since. [Laughter.] So much the worse. The argument in the letter from the Postmaster General relates to the next section of the bill and not to this section at all. [Laughter on the Republican side.] The gentleman probably forgot. I was charitable to him. He probably did not know that the next section was in the bill. That next section relates to star-route contracts. That was the section of the law that the Postmaster General refers to in his letter.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the pro forma amendment will be considered as withdrawn.

Mr. MANN. I reserved the point of order.

Mr. BENNET. I reserve a point of order.

Mr. MOON. If it is the intention of the gentlemen ultimately to make the point of order, I would be glad to have them make it now. It is subject to a point of order.

Mr. MANN. I will say frankly, as far as I am concerned, that I do not intend to make the point of order. I am perfectly willing to withdraw it.

Mr. BENNET. I have reserved the point of order, and I will state with equal frankness that if there is nothing in the section different from what I now see I shall not make the point of order.

Mr. MOON. I just wanted to suggest that if it was the gentleman's ultimate purpose to make the point of order the discussion would be useless. I have no objection to the discussion, of course.

Mr. BENNET. I simply desire to call the attention of the committee, and particularly the attention of the gentleman from Illinois, to the fact that under this section, in accordance with prior rulings, the Postmaster General would have the absolute right to operate star routes with aeroplanes. If the gentleman will recall, in the Sixtieth Congress the question came up as to whether in the Signal Service of the Army "war balloons," as they were called in an amendment then offered, could be used. Our friend, James Breck Perkins, than whom a better scholar or a sweeter and kinder gentleman never served in this House, was Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. The question was debated extensively, for possibly a couple of hours, and the Chairman, in rulings of that scholarly character, which always distinguished his public utterances, held that so long as the War Department had the authority to maintain a Signal Service, the method through which they should maintain it would be governed in accordance with the rules governing a work in progress, and permitted the inclusion of the words "war balloons"; whereupon the House increased the appropriation $500,000 for the express purpose of utilizing war balloons in connection with the Signal Service.

Now, I think the gentleman from Illinois is quite correct in saying that there is no reason at all why the Postmaster General may not use aeroplanes, if he wishes to do so. I find nothing in the postal laws that compels him to use a wagon, an automobile, a snow plow, or anything else on a star route, and under one section he is permitted expressly to use a canal boat. So, if he thinks an aeroplane is the better vehicle to use on a star route, and he advertises for bids, he can under this section use aeroplanes.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will yield——

Mr. BENNET. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. I do not think he could advertise for bids, but the Postmaster General may purchase aeroplanes and operate them and never ask for bids, because there is no limitation whatever.

Mr. BENNET. The gentleman is quite correct. Under this section as it stands the Postmaster General would have the right to buy a hundred aeroplanes at any price. And I might say that illustrates the unwisdom of this method of legislation. I am not going to make a point of order against it, because I am in favor of progress, and if the Postmaster General, who is the Postmaster General until March 4, 1917, wants to use aeroplanes, progressive people ought not to interfere with him.

Mr. SLOAN. If there be objection on the part of the gentleman or anybody else to aeroplanes in the star route service, under the rule stated by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] could not their use be prevented by simply adopting an amendment providing affirmatively that the department shall use automobiles and aeroplanes; and then having made a positive command, we would expect it to be entirely disobeyed under the rule of the department? [Laughter.]

Mr. BENNET. I should expect that to be done, but that would not get you anywhere, because now they can use them if they want to, and can refrain from using them if they want to.

Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET] withdraws the point of order. The gentleman from Indiana——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I want to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is recognized.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move that all of the paragraph after the word "expedient," in line 24, on page 30, be stricken out.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 30, line 24, after the word "expedient," insert a period and strike out the remainder of the paragraph, which reads as follows: "Without reference to existing law or laws respecting the employment of personal service or the procurement of conveyances, materials, or supplies."

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, the tendency to give to the administrative departments discretion over and above existing law is growing in this House. It is a tendency that ought to be resisted. The administrators of the law should be governed by the law like all other good citizens, and it seems to me we ought not by express provision permit the Postmaster General, or any other officer of the Government, to conduct himself without the pale of the law. I offer this amendment in good faith, and at the same time desire to comment briefly upon the tendency to which I have referred.

A short time ago we passed by, subject to a point of order, the paragraph proposing to create what in effect will be a new Government bureau, to organize and give surety bonds on behalf of the Government to its employees. This is a departure in the way of governmental control that ought not to be tolerated at this time, yet we are told when objection is made to the paragraph that it is to be adopted in another way by a rule. The ordinary citizen of the United States does not understand this practice of legislation by rule, and since I may not have an opportunity to refer to it under the provisions of the rule when it comes in, I should like to say now that government by rule is an obnoxious form of government. Gentlemen in this House have the privilege of introducing bills to create any kind of legislation. They have the right to suggest that there shall be a law creating a surety department in the Government. They do not bring it in in that way so that there may be debate upon the floor, so that it may go before a committee as all other matters of legislation have to go to be considered in the committee with hearings upon either side, but they put it into an appropriation bill which comes out of a powerful committee, and then, when a point of order is made upon the ground that it is new legislation and can not be considered on an appropriation bill, they blandly tell the House that they propose to do by indirection what they can not do by direction, and force this legislation upon the House and down the throats of the people of the country by what is known as a rule. That rule is going to cover a multitude of sins when it comes in. I am surprised that it should have been agreed to so readily as it was. It did not become public property until within this last half hour that a rule was to be brought in forcing these matters down the throats of the Members of this House, but apparently we are going to be gagged. We are to be gagged on the question of the creation of a surety department, we are to be gagged on the question of increased railway mail pay, and we are to be gagged on a series of other questions, not by the ordinary method of procedure, but by the method which comes in the form of a rule.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. FINLEY. In the days when the Republicans were in power did the gentleman ever vote for any rules that were brought in? In fact, did he not vote for every one that the Committee on Rules brought in?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I have never voted for a rule which proposed to do what is proposed to be done in this case; and in this respect I wish to say that the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, as highly as I esteem its members, has brought in numerous propositions which have been objected to upon this floor legally and which ought never to have been brought in in the form in which they were brought in, because they prevented the House from debating the propositions. At one time our taking over for Government control not only the railroad lines but the telegraph and telephone lines of the country was contemplated—a stupendous proposition—which should never have passed without the most careful and deliberate consideration. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, our good friend, the gentleman from Pennsylvania, has just delivered himself of some criticisms upon what he anticipates may come. I judge he does this because he will probably not be present when, as he thinks, this outrageous rule may be brought into the House, so he wants to get in to-night so that it may be known how he stands on the proposition.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I concede that it was my purpose to tell the House and the country what they would be up against in a short while, as soon as this rule comes in. We have no knowledge as to what the rule will provide, whether we will have debate on the rule or not, and if we are to be gagged some time we may as well be forewarned about it.

Mr. FOSTER. Of course, the country and the House is very much indebted to the gentleman for his knowledge beforehand.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I am pleased to have been able to tell the country.

Mr. FOSTER. This rule has been reported—that is, voted out of the committee for more than a week—and I suppose the gentleman had just awakened to the fact that a rule——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman from Pennsylvania was here the whole of last week; can the gentleman from Illinois say as much? I think the gentleman will not answer that question.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I can not yield. So at a time like this, when the committee has brought in some legislation which is out of order on the bill, but in the interest of the Government and the people of the United States, I will say possibly not in the interest of a few individuals who might be specially benefited if this legislation were not adopted, now the gentleman finds fault with the Democratic majority for bringing in a rule which is in the interest of the people of the country.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOSTER. Just a moment. The great trouble with the gentleman's party when it was in power was in bringing in rules that were not in the interest of the people. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. MANN. Has a rule been agreed upon?

Mr. FOSTER. A rule has been agreed upon.

Mr. MANN. A week or two ago?

Mr. FOSTER. Week before last.

Mr. MANN. Why did not the committee report it to the House as two other rules were reported to the House, so that the Members of the House might know what was in the rule?

Mr. FOSTER. I will say to my colleague this rule was reported from the Committee on Rules with the distinct understanding that these paragraphs should be read and whatever was left of them in the bill were then not to be included in the rule, so that is the reason——

Mr. MANN. Then the rule has not been agreed upon?

Mr. FOSTER. Oh, yes; the rule has been agreed upon, with the distinct understanding with every member of the committee—this procedure agreed upon by every member of the committee—but I do not mean to be understood that all members agreed to the rule.

Mr. MANN. Do I understand the gentleman to say a committee of this House, reporting a rule or a bill, can say that they favored it and give the man who makes the report the authority to leave out such-and-such a section if he wants to do so?

Mr. FOSTER. I will say to my colleague this: At the solicitation of members upon the minority side of the Committee on Rules that distinct understanding was made, that whatever was left of this bill should be reported as that rule and not reported before the bill had been read through. Now, I think there is nothing unfair about that; I think there is nothing but what the House knows and what every Member ought to know and every member of that committee does know.

Now, that is a fair statement; it is a fair action by the Committee on Rules, and it was a fair treatment of that side of the House on this proposition.

Mr. MANN. We have not been able to learn yet what is going to be in the rule. The gentleman says it was agreed upon two weeks ago. No one can tell except the gentleman from Tennessee, who said a moment ago that anything stricken out of the bill on a point of order would be included as in order under the rule.

Mr. FOSTER. That was the distinct understanding.

Mr. MANN. Why did not they make a rule to say that and introduce it in the House?

Mr. FOSTER. That might have been done, but it would have been no fairer or better.

Mr. MANN. Why not say the Committee on Rules reports a rule and anything the Post Office Committee reports in the Post Office bill is in order, no matter what the rules of the House are?

Mr. FOSTER. That is simply a matter of procedure.

Mr. MANN. Then the Committee on Rules could tell the House, and we would all know what it is. As it is now, it is all in the information of my distinguished friend.

Mr. FOSTER. I will say my colleague is not usually taken by surprise, and I am sure he will be able to inform that side of the House of the exact condition——

Mr. MANN. The only reason I will not be taken by surprise——

Mr. FOSTER (continuing). And I am sure my colleague will not be surprised in this case.

Mr. MANN (continuing). Is that I try not to be surprised at anything and to be prepared for the alternative, whatever it is. I do not know which alternative will be presented.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I would like two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FOSTER. I think the gentleman from Illinois is always alert and intelligent upon these propositions, and that he will not be taken by surprise in reference to this matter.

Mr. MANN. Nothing, no matter how bad it is, coming from the Democratic Committee on Rules will take me by surprise. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. FOSTER. Well, I will say this in reply to my colleague, that I am sure he is not taken by surprise, whether it is good or bad; but in this case I feel sure my colleague recognizes the importance and the great benefit to the people of the country of this legislation.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOSTER. I believe the intelligence and the patriotism of my colleague is such that while he may criticize the Democrats and keep up his usual procedure of doing so, that he is not going to object except politically to the procedure in this case.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman knows that, no matter how bad anything done by the Democratic Party as to rules has been, it is infinitely better than the best that can be done by a Republican Committee on Rules.

Mr. FOSTER. I think everybody agrees to that.

Mr. MANN. That is a "me, too," proposition. We have heard it so often I think he would get something new.

Mr. FOSTER. It is the old, old story; but it is so good it should be told frequently to that side of the House.

Mr. MANN. Your best claim always is to try to copy something that we did that is bad.

Mr. FITZGERALD. And no matter what our side has done, it is never as bad as what that side of the House does.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania by striking out the last word of his amendment.

I do that for the purpose of asking the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] to modify one of his statements. I do not think that either one of us is at liberty to disclose what took place in the Committee on Rules, but I think if the gentleman will reflect he will change that part of his remarks in which he said that the particular course which he indicated was taken at the solicitation of the minority. That is not my recollection. I shall not go further into details.

Mr. FOSTER. If the gentleman from New York will permit, I realize I ought not to make a statement of things that occurred in committee, but I felt this matter should be stated to the House, and so I stated it, because the gentleman from Pennsylvania had made some criticisms. Now, let me say I shall not go into this matter at this time, but I think the gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET] will recall that it was made possible in coming to an agreement in this matter, by a suggestion made by some one upon the majority side of the committee in answer to one on the minority side, that this matter should be proceeded with in this way, and it was agreed to. Now, I think there was no question about that. I do not mean that the minority agreed to the rule, but I mean they agreed to this procedure.

Mr. BENNET. Nor did we desire this particular method of procedure.

Mr. FOSTER. I think there was no objection to that.

Mr. BENNET. I do not think there was any objection.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not think I heard any.

Mr. BENNET. It was not made at the solicitation of the minority at all. We had no interest in having the rule reported.

Mr. FOSTER. I think the first suggestion, if the gentleman will recall, came from his side of the committee, that this procedure ought to be followed.

Mr. BENNET. Well——

Mr. FOSTER. I do not think I am wrong about that, and I do not think I am violating any secrets of the committee in stating it.

Mr. BENNET. I will not say anything about what took place in the committee. I will say that my recollection differs slightly from the gentleman's recollection, not materially, but slightly. But I want to say to the gentleman from South Carolina, who talked about voting for rules, that it is quite true when the Republicans were in power they did report rules, but that the tendency of the Congress since the Democrats came into power to rely on rules is regrettable. I have looked up the Sixty-first Congress and compared it with the Sixty-third Congress, because each was a Congress of three sessions, and each dealt with a tariff bill, and in other respects the Congresses were analogous. In the Sixty-first Congress, a Republican Congress, when we had, at least toward the last, a more or less nominal majority, we succeeded in getting through with 22 rules. In the Sixty-third Congress, a Democratic Congress, with 140 majority, that Congress required 34 rules. In other words, they increased the number of rules over the Republican Congress 50 per cent.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BENNET. Certainly.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Is it not a fact that the Sixty-first Congress only passed 22 special rules because they could not get enough votes to pass any more? That is when they had all the insurgents over there, and they could not get them to vote for any rule at all.

Mr. BENNET. No; when we needed any votes to carry anything through we could get some Democrats. [Laughter on the Republican side.] I do not recall that we ever had to refrain from reporting a rule because of any feeling that we would not get the votes necessary. We got along with 22 rules because we operated under the rules of the House, and if the Democratic majority would attempt more of that and had attempted more of that in the Sixty-third Congress they would have stood higher in the estimation of the country, because, whether the House is Republican or Democratic, there is a feeling throughout the country, when we are unable to operate under our rules, that we are not exhibiting the highest degree of intelligence; and it is a serious reflection on this House when we are increasing in so short a time as two Congresses the number of special rules required by 50 per cent.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to withdraw his pro forma amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 6. That section 3949 of the Revised Statutes be amended to read as follows:

"All contracts for carrying the mail shall be in the name of the United States and shall be awarded to the lowest bidder tendering sufficient guaranties for faithful performance in accordance with the terms of the advertisement: Provided, however, That such contracts require due celerity, certainty, and security in the performance of the service; but the Postmaster General shall not be bound to consider the bid of any person who has willfully or negligently failed to perform a former contract."

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order for the purpose of asking for an explanation.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York reserves a point of order.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I would like to know what is intended to be done by the amendment.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. FINLEY] explained this section when he was attempting to explain the other section.

Mr. FINLEY. What is it that the gentleman wishes to know?

Mr. BENNET. What is the change of existing law that is made by this amendment?

Mr. FINLEY. It enlarges the discretion of the Postmaster General to reject bids of every person who has willfully or negligently failed to perform a former contract.

Mr. BENNET. Is it the proviso that is new?

Mr. FINLEY. Well, there is something preceding the proviso.

Mr. BENNET. This seems to be a change of regulation, of section 3949 of the regulations, and it does seem as if the House should have some explanation.

Mr. FINLEY. I would say to the gentleman that the first five lines there change the existing law very little, practically none. The proviso is what carries the change.

Mr. BENNET. In view of the explanation, I withdraw the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman withdraws the point of order.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington reserves a point of order.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I wanted to inquire whether, if this change of law were made, it would help in the movement of the mails. I will give an illustration: I have a brother who lives in New York City, in one of the suburbs, and it takes from two to three days for a letter that I mail here to reach him. I can get on a train and be in his house in five hours and a half, but if I get a letter from him or if he gets one of my letters and it reaches him in less than 48 hours we think it is doing well.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Why does not the gentleman take the letter with him when he goes over? [Laughter.]

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. The reason that I do not take it with me is that I mail it and get there first. [Laughter.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Ahead of the letter?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Yes; ahead of the letter a couple of days.

Now, if there is anything in this change of law that will hasten the delivery of mail between here and New York, I will withdraw the point of order. I happen to have a communication here from the Merchants' Association of New York, and while I am on my feet I want to call your attention to the fact that it seems to take 92 hours to deliver a letter from one portion of the city of New York to another. I do not suppose this provision will help that situation, but I can give specific instances if anybody is interested in hearing them and wants to know of them. I have a letter here which says that the report of the Merchants' Association shows that bulletins mailed out by the Merchants' Association before noon on Saturday did not reach the Borough of Richmond——

Mr. BENNET. That is on Staten Island——

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Until Wednesday at 9.15 o'clock, taking for a 6½-mile journey the leisurely time of 93 hours. [Laughter.]

Mr. MADDEN. Maybe there was not a boat running.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Perhaps this paragraph may to some extent remedy that condition so that we can get a letter to New York in 24 hours. If so, I will withdraw my point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman withdraws his point of order, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 7. That the limit of weight of mail matter of the first class shall be the same as is applicable to mail of the fourth class: Provided, That no article or package exceeding 4 pounds in weight shall be admitted to the mails under the penalty privilege unless it comes within the exceptions named in the acts of June 8, 1896 (ch. 370, 29 Stat. L., p. 262), and June 26, 1906 (ch. 3546, 34 Stat. L., p. 477).

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on this section, for the purpose of obtaining some information. Are we to understand that by the adoption of this amendment the weight limit of first-class mail will be 4 pounds, or will it be 50 pounds?

Mr. FINLEY. The reason stated by the department for desiring the passage of this section is as follows:

The weight limit of mail matter of the first class is now fixed by law at 4 pounds. Persons desiring to mail matter of this class weighing more than 4 pounds are therefore greatly inconvenienced, and there is consequently a demand for an increase of the weight limit of such matter.

I will say to the gentleman that there will be no loss to the Government by the adoption of this provision.

Mr. STAFFORD. It proposes to increase the mailable weight of first-class matter to 50 pounds?

Mr. FINLEY. I do not know. If it is so increased, the revenues of the Government will be increased accordingly.

Mr. STAFFORD. I am simply asking for the purpose of ascertaining the extent and purpose of this section. Have the committee had any hearings on this matter?

Mr. FINLEY. I think not.

Mr. STAFFORD. No hearings! The committee just accepted the recommendation of the department?

Mr. FINLEY. There were hearings before. These provisions have been brought into the House before, and there were hearings at that time.

Mr. STAFFORD. Can the gentleman inform me when this identical provision was offered in the House and when hearings were had upon it?

Mr. FINLEY. I do not recall. I think it has been here before.

Mr. STAFFORD. I think it is entirely new.

Mr. FINLEY. The revenues of the Government are derived to a very large extent from first-class mail, and any increase in weight will be paid for according to the rate fixed by law, so it can only make for the benefit of the Government.

Mr. STAFFORD. I withdraw the reservation of the point of order.

Mr. MANN. I reserve a point of order. Although I think it is quite hopeless, I am going to endeavor to obtain information. Here we have a proposition upon which there have been no hearings, about which the gentlemen in charge of the bill appear to know but little, if anything; and if it should go out on a point of order, it is proposed to make it in order by a rule. It seems surprising that such a course should be pursued. Certainly if you are going to violate the ordinary rules of the House and make things in order which, under the rules of the House, would not be in order, gentlemen in charge of the measure ought to have a full understanding upon the propositions which are offered. This proposition apparently increases the weight limit of first-class mail matter to 50 pounds. Clearly it does so. What does this proviso in reference to the penalty privilege amount to? Does that cover franked matter—mail franked by Members of Congress, for instance? Does it limit them to 4 pounds? Here is a new limitation:

No article or package exceeding 4 pounds in weight shall be admitted to the mails under the penalty privilege—

Unless it comes within certain exceptions. Does that affect, for instance, the boxes that Members of Congress have the privilege of sending home under their franks—the boxes furnished to them by the Government?

Mr. FINLEY. If the gentleman from Illinois will read it, it says:

Under the penalty privilege.

The penalty privilege is not that which applies to the mail of Members of Congress.

Mr. MANN. That is what I want to know.

Mr. FINLEY. I assumed that the gentleman knew that. I think he served on the Post Office Committee once, and is well informed on postal matters. It reads here as plainly as can be:

Under the penalty privilege.

Mr. MANN. Was it during my service on the committee that these hearings were had upon this proposition?

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Chairman, I will say that it was during the gentleman's service on the committee that the penalty privilege was the law of the land.

Mr. MANN. I thought it was during my service on the committee that these hearings were had, because the nearest I ever was to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads was either to look into the room from the outside or to pay a complimentary call upon its distinguished chairman.

Mr. MOON. What is that? [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. I can assure the gentleman from Tennessee that that was not a partisan remark. [Laughter.]

Mr. MOON. It is about the first one that my good friend has not made.

Mr. MANN. Well, I am different from my good friend from Tennessee, because he never made any, and I have made one.

Mr. MOON. Oh, I have made a few.

Mr. MANN. If you are going to admit all first-class matter up to 50 pounds, why should there be any limitation as to what the Government needs to send?

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman has heard read the reason of the department for it, has he not? The weight limit of mail matter of the first class is now fixed at 4 pounds.

Mr. MANN. Oh, I knew that.

Mr. MOON. Then the gentleman knows that persons desiring to mail matter of this class weighing more than 4 pounds are greatly inconvenienced, and, in consequence, there is a demand for an increase in the limit of weight. That is what the department thinks. There is a demand for an increase in the limit of weight on account of the fact of its being limited as it is now.

Mr. MANN. I will say to the gentleman that I have made no inquiry about that. What I have made inquiry about is the limitation in the proviso, where you limit the amount of Government mail to 4 pounds. If you are going to increase the limit of first-class mail from 4 to 50 pounds, why should not the Government have the same right as an ordinary individual?

Mr. MOON. I do not know why the Government should not.

Mr. MANN. That is what I thought.

Mr. MOON. Chapter 370 of the act to regulate mail matter of the fourth class provides:

That mailable matter of the fourth class shall embrace all matter not embraced in the first, second, or third class which is not in its form or nature liable to destroy, deface, or otherwise damage the contents of the mail bag or harm the person or anyone engaged in the Postal Service, and is not above the weight provided by law, which is hereby declared to be not exceeding 4 pounds for each package thereof, except in case of single books weighing in excess of that amount, and except for books and documents published or circulated by order of Congress, or printed or written official matter emanating from any of the departments of the Government or from the Smithsonian Institution, or which is not declared nonmailable under the provisions of section 3893 of the Revised Statutes as amended by the act of July 12, 1876, or matter appertaining to lotteries, gift concerts, or fraudulent schemes or devices.

The Government does not send mail matter under the frank that is usually in excess of 4 pounds for a single item, except occasionally a book.

Mr. MANN. The Government can not do it now because there is law forbidding it, but frequently the Government desires to. I have known cases repeatedly under the Government where, instead of sending one package weighing over 4 pounds, it was divided up into a dozen packages, each weighing less than 4 pounds, in order to send the same thing by mail, but at a much greater expense. Now, it is proposed to remove the limit of 4 pounds for ordinary mail matter, and why should it not be removed as to governmental matter?

Mr. MOON. I think the reason is clear in this, that generally the weight sent by the Government is less than 4 pounds.

Mr. MANN. That would be a very good reason for increasing the possibility of weight to 50 pounds.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Mr. Chairman, I desire to confirm the statement of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] in regard to the necessity of frequently dividing Government mail into separate packages if this provision is adopted. Land offices are scattered over the public-land States. They frequently, in fact every month, send on their reports to the General Land Office. The quantity of mail frequently amounts to two or three hundred pounds; and if this provision prevails, they will have to tie up in 4-pound packages these reports, at the expense of a great deal of time and some annoyance, and it would be necessary to have scales in the office to weigh them, to see that they do not exceed the 4-pound limit.

Mr. MOON. Is this official work?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Yes; the land cases of the local land offices, with the records, are sent on to the General Land Office. They send on these reports and they are so bulky they amount to probably two or three hundred pounds, and the register will be required to tie them up in 4-pound packages and send them in that way, because of the provision which is proposed.

Mr. MOON. What amendment would the gentleman suggest?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. It seems to me we should leave that provision out entirely.

Mr. MANN. Strike out the proviso?

Mr. MOON. Strike out altogether the language referring to this?

Mr. MANN. Strike out the proviso and raise the first-class mail limit from 4 to 50 pounds, and it would apply to Government matter as well as to matter mailed by private individuals.

Mr. FINLEY. If the gentleman from Illinois will permit, I think I can give some of the history of this matter. In 1907 in the Post Office hearings the fact was developed that the Government was shipping iron safes through the mail to post offices throughout the country; was shipping post-office equipment, and so on; and that officers at Army posts were mailing under the penalty or franks billiard tables, furniture, and so forth.

Mr. MANN. If they were, they were violating the law.

Mr. FINLEY. And that was the reason for this legislation at that time.

Mr. MANN. I understand. I do think the 50-pound limit would be injurious.

Mr. FINLEY. That is what I know about the history of this legislation, that it was necessary, or thought necessary, at that time, and it did stop that practice, or rather practices, on the part of the department and Army-post officers.

Mr. MOON. Does the gentleman desire to amend the bill?

Mr. MANN. I think the proviso ought to go out. That is my own opinion about it. The gentleman from Wisconsin thinks it ought not.

Mr. STAFFORD. I think it would be a mistake to strike out the proviso.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I am reserving the point of order.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, about a month or six weeks ago this provision of this law was called to my attention, and I went to the chairman of the committee and asked him if it was not solely for the purpose of enabling the Treasury Department to ship money by mail instead of by express, as they had previously done under the provisions of this act, and if it was I wanted to enter my protest, because under the weight of the statement it did not seem to me it was fair to the railroad companies to have this done.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman has the wrong provision.

Mr. HILL. I am confident this is the provision, but I will ask the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] if this is not the provision about which I had the conversation with him?

Mr. MOON. If it is so, I am not aware of it, but it may possibly be so; I have no information along that line.

Mr. HILL. The gentleman very kindly consented to a hearing in regard to that matter, but my attention is called by the gentleman from Illinois to the provision on the next page, which simply shows my unfamiliarity with this whole law, and I was quite confident it was the section about which I had the conversation. There is somewhere here such a provision, which is unfair and unjust, and I do not see why it should be allowed. If this is not the provision, I confess my error, and I will wait until we reach it.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Tennessee want to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. MOON. No; but I am surprised, after the understanding with the gentleman that we should discuss this matter for an hour, he should make the point of order on it instead of making it at the beginning.

Mr. BENNET. The gentleman from Tennessee is not as fair as he usually is. The understanding we had was in relation to the preceding paragraph, and that understanding I kept to the letter.

Mr. MOON. I hope if the gentleman makes the point of order he will make it at the beginning of a matter that is subject to the point of order. We have wasted an hour of the public's time here in discussion.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman make the point of order?

Mr. MANN. I desire to say that pretty nearly all the discussion amounts to nothing, because we did not get any information.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Chairman, I demand the regular order.

Mr. BENNET. I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to go back a few lines, so that I may introduce an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. To what point?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Two or three lines; to line 12.

The CHAIRMAN. On this page?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Idaho asks unanimous consent to go back to paragraph ending in line 12 of page 31 of the bill.

Mr. FINLEY. I object, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is heard. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 8. That so much of section 1 of the "Act making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes," approved August 24, 1912, which provides that the Post Office Department shall not extend or enlarge its present policy of sending second-class matter by freight trains, is hereby repealed.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET] reserves a point of order on the paragraph.

Mr. MOON. What paragraph is that?

The CHAIRMAN. Paragraph 8.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order will be pending.

The gentleman from Tennessee moves that the committee do now rise.
